THE MUSICAL TIMES

Price 3½d.

JANUARY 1, 1880

THE HIGHEST HONOUR, PARIS, 1878; THE CROSS OF THE LEGION OF HONOUR; THE GOLD MEDAL (L'ACADÉMIE NATIONALE); AND ALSO THE SILVER MEDAL; THE GOLD MEDAL AND DIPLOMA OF HONOUR, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877; THE MEDAL OF HONOUR AND DIPLOMA OF MERIT, PHILADELPHIA, 1876; THE GRAND DIPLOMA OF HONOUR, PARIS, 1874; THE GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1869; THE DIPLOMA OF EXTRAORDINARY MERIT, AMSTERDAM, 1869; MEDAL OF HONOUR, PARIS, 1867; PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862; &c., &c., HAVE BEEN AWARDED TO

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes A SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE.

"A. FETIS,
"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.
"D. MAGNUS."

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

"These Pianos have received the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

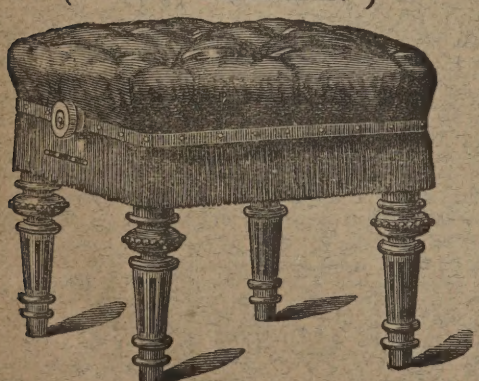
PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")



THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

Price Lists and Illustrations free on application to us or to any Musicseller, through whom these Stools and other articles of Music Furniture can be obtained.

BLACK AND GOLD STOOLS AND CANTERBURIES IN GREAT VARIETY.

OF

CLARA SCHUMANN.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have much pleasure in calling attention to the new and complete edition of Schumann's Works, edited by Madame Schumann, and about to be published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. This is of course the first time it has been possible to obtain a complete edition of Schumann's Works, and it is perhaps unnecessary to point out the great advantage the edition will receive in being edited by Madame Schumann.

The first issue of the publication, containing—

Op. 9. Carnival
Op. 10. Phantasiestücke
Op. 17. Phantasie
Op. 21. Novelletten

} In One Volume, 10s. 6d. net,

Is now ready, and may be had on application.

NEW SONG

WORDS BY DEAN ALFORD.

MUSIC BY GABRIEL DAVIS.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"It would be difficult to find words better suited to musical treatment than those by the late Dean of Canterbury. Mrs. Davis has evidently studied them well, and shown considerable merit."—Orchestra.

"First in the rank is 'The Coming Year,' the touching words by Dean Alford, the appropriate music by Gabriel Davis."—Graphic.

The beautiful words of this song were written shortly before the death of the late lamented Dean of Canterbury.

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

BY

J. CURWEN & SONS, 8, WARWICK LANE, E.C.

SHORT ANTHEMS
FOR CHOIRS AND CONGREGATIONS

EDITED BY J. SPENCER CURWEN,

Associate of the Royal Academy of Music.

Published this day, in Staff Notation or Tonic Sol-fa, cloth, 1s.

In ordering, please specify which notation is required. The following composers have specially written Anthems for this work: E. J. Hopkins, J. L. Hatton (2), G. B. Allen (3), J. Langran (2), Sir George Elvey (2), James Vaughan, W. H. Birch, and the Editor. The Collection also includes Anthems by Sir John Goss, Professor Macfarren, W. Smallwood, &c. The preface explains the aim and character of the work. It says: "This collection aims at combining musical simplicity with modern harmony and modern forms of musical expression. It seeks to avoid commonplace, and yet to present music which average choirs, and congregations of rather more than average musical culture, can freely unite in. Anthems which satisfy these conditions are few and hard to find. The Editor has enjoyed the help of a number of composers, who have tied themselves most carefully to the conditions which he laid down. He has also selected Anthems in the same style from various sources."

THE HARMONY-PLAYER, FOR THE HARMONIUM

BY JOHN CURWEN,

ASSISTED BY

HENRY FISHER, Mus. Doc., and GEORGE OAKEY, Mus. Bac.

In wrapper, price 1s. 6d.

This work has already done good service in a Tonic Sol-fa edition, and a Staff Notation edition is published this day in response to general request. The plan of the work, which is altogether novel, will be seen by the following quotation from the preface: "A new art of fingering has of late years come into use, which may be called 'phrase fingering,' in which the player looks forward and studies the compass and other peculiarities of the harmonic phrase before him, and adapts his fingering to its wants. This book concerns itself chiefly with 'phrase fingering,' and endeavours to reduce it to rule, and to show the pupils how to apply those rules. I think that elementary composition may follow very quickly after the mechanical difficulties of a finger-board instrument are conquered, but until then I think it is enough for the pupil to know, by the sound, what chords his fingers are playing. And it is right that pupils should enjoy hearing chords and chord progressions as soon as possible. The ear helps the fingers, by familiarising itself with the chords and chord progressions which have to be played. Intelligence helps work. 'Intelligent handling,' says Mr. Scott Russell, 'makes even the navvy's spade move quicker and better.' It wonderfully adds to the pleasure of the learner, and pleasure, Mr. Herbert Spencer teaches, is a prime element in all fruitful learning, because pleasurable impressions are the deepest." Please order the Staff Notation edition.

THE HARMONIUM ALBUM

(STAFF NOTATION), PUBLISHED THIS DAY.

Vols. I. and II., in wrapper, 2s. each; or the two volumes in one, cloth, gilt, 5s.

Vol. I. contains 64, and Vol. II. 62 pieces, all of which are new.

The preface says: "This collection embraces a large variety of style, but it has been made with a constant view to the nature and character of the harmonium. Existing collections of harmonium music are too much filled with the heavy four-part harmony of anthems, oratorio choruses, hymn-tunes, or part-songs. This massive harmony is suitable for the organ, but on the harmonium its effect is windy and very monotonous. In the following pages there is not a single composition of this sort. The pieces have all been written or arranged for the instrument, and speaking generally, they give more prominence to melody than to harmony. Thick chords are avoided, and the ear is relieved by melodic phrases answering one another in the various parts, or by softly accompanied melodies in which there is scope for the delicate effects of the expression stop. These Voluntaries may be played on the organ, or the harmonium with pedals, in which case the indication of the pedal, which is given in some of the pieces, will be found useful. The Voluntaries are also available for the American organ. This instrument differs from the harmonium in having no expression stop, and in the place of the break. The bass is also less prominent. The player will easily see how to adapt the registering to the capabilities of his instrument."

POPULAR CANTATAS.

The following Cantatas, sacred and secular, are recommended to Choral Societies, Church Choirs, Sunday School Choirs, &c. They supply melodious and simple music, full of interest and point, yet within the capacity of ordinary singers. Almost any choir may attempt them, and they supply the want of those who wish to sing something more than hymn-tunes, and yet are not ready for the difficulties of high-class music. The large and steadily increasing sale is the best proof of the value of these works. Several are edited with new accompaniments by HENRY FISHER, Esq., Mus. Doc.

MONTHLY JOURNAL OF MUSICAL PROGRESS.

THE TONIC SOL-FA REPORTER

EDITED BY

JOHN CURWEN AND J. SPENCER CURWEN.

Published on the 1st of every month, price 1d., containing eight pages of music and twenty-four of letterpress.

Annual Subscription, post-free, 1s. 6d.

The Reporter appeals to and is increasingly read by all persons interested in the social, religious, and educational purposes of music, whether they adopt the Tonic Sol-fa system or not. It is also the Organ of the Tonic Sol-fa Movement. Each number has articles of general musical interest. Mr. Ebenezer Prout, the well-known musical critic, writes in the Academy of a recent yearly volume: "In addition to the details of Sol-fa classes, concerts, &c., the Reporter contains a large number of interesting papers on musical subjects, and in the literary value of its articles may compare favourably with many of its more ambitious contemporaries."

CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

By J. POWELL METCALFE.

"DOES the result pay for the toil and bother? Is the game worth the candle?" Such thought must ever and anon be thrusting itself on the mind of him who undertakes the work of improving choirs by association. At the outset then it will be well to take stock of the real and substantial benefits that accrue from Choral Association; benefits no less real and substantial because gradual in development. But first let us be quite sure that we set before us the improvement of our choirs for the better rendering of their home services as the first and chief, if not the only, end and aim of our Association.

Once for all let us accept the truth that the rightful aim of Choral Association can never be display—in church or out of church; its purpose cannot be to give opportunity to this or that choir to show off its cassocks and surplices, or what it may fancy is its superior skill. Nor even can it be for the general display of a grand service, though it may tend to show life and movement in the church; nor, again, can its aim be to supply occasion for pleasant outings to choirs and their hangers-on, and so to act as bait to catch new members that will assuredly turn out more for show than use.

No—let us repeat it—the rightful aim of Choral Association is the improvement of choirs. And in many ways does it tend to bring about this improvement.

It is the most potent and at the same time the least painful specific against that darling vice of choirs, conceit. It strikes at the very root of that too common choral fallacy, that all that is right, and good, and true is summed up in the little phrase, "what we do." It shows other choirs existing as choirs with other uses, which said uses—some of them—may possibly in time turn out worthy of adoption.

Then, "as iron sharpeneth iron," so does association brace up the flagging choir. "The men won't come to practice!" This is the cry of every choir-leader: but they will come to practice if they have got the festival book in hand with its new tunes and anthem that will "want a deal of getting-up," especially if their neighbours from B., and C., and D., are coming the week after next to meet the precentor with A. itself, and the choir of B. has been hard at work weeks ago, and it won't do to be behind B.—that it won't. And then should the choir of A. or B., or C. or D., be a really good choir, what an advantage will this united rehearsal be to the others. The best choirmaster breathing can never give so useful a lesson as can the better choir to the worse, by the mere act of singing together with it; and well indeed would it be if better choirs would realise their power for good and improve their talent to their neighbour's benefit, instead of meanly holding aloof from contact, practically mistrusting their own power in fear of being mistaught by the worse.

But not one word let us say against the better choir; for, truth to say, experience teaches that it is the better choir that as a rule is the readiest to associate. It might almost be said that such readiness to associate is of itself proof of proficiency; for strange as it may seem, it is the case, that those who would in reality gain the most by association are just those who most obstinately hold back from all united choral action.

The great mass of the non-associating is made up of choirs under the sole direction of the schoolmaster, and choirs where the ladies of the parsonage hold rule.

In the first case it is usually the total ignorance of music on the part of all the inmates of the parsonage that throws the reins of government into the hands of the schoolmaster, and he—not unnaturally and, from his point of view, most wisely—is unwilling to submit his qualifications to hold those reins to the test of association. In his own little village choir he is the cream of cream; he has certain reasons, no doubt exceedingly good, for thinking it within the range of possibility that, if mixed up with others, he might not rise, creamwise, to the surface; and so no association for him or the choir he reigns over. In the second case the good parson is, and never tires of telling you that he is, fully satisfied with the church-music supplied through the instrumentality of his wife or daughters. There is certainly something touching in the husband or father feeling, and owning to feel, that all music in his church must thus begin and end with his dear wife or daughters; but it is to be feared that some of the coarser and more matter-of-fact of the world will pronounce it somewhat hard on those who worship in that church. Perhaps it is not quite fair, after all, to lay the whole blame in every case on the husband or father. Let it be at once most heartily acknowledged that for earnest self-sacrificing choral work that knows no halting or weariness, for watchful tact and purpose that draws forth all true work from others, the Christian lady stands alone. Let it be acknowledged with deepest satisfaction how great is the number of such ladies who are at work with our choirs actuated by the highest and purest motives, thankfully accepting the aid and help of the sympathy association can alone supply. Grant all this, and we must ungallantly ask it, to be also granted, that for solid uncompromising opposition to all improvement by association or otherwise, without a rival, sometimes stands the lady who looks after her own choir. Every suggestion of change—improvement must not be hinted at—in the order established by her is met with a kindly smile of pity, as if there were some divine strain of melody, that she knew of and you did not, lying hid beneath the uncouth sounds she permits to pass under the name of choir-singing. Be on your guard; you must not interfere by the most distant suggestion, or you will lose all her goodwill and respect.

Yet one word more before we proceed to detail. Let us distinctly set before us that true Choral Association seeks to do its work by its own powers. It does not, rather it need not necessarily by any means, undertake to supply teaching to choirs. Its special object is, not itself to teach, but to foster and help, and give interest and heart, to home-teaching. No doubt most choral unions do make the supply of lessons by accredited choirmasters a part of their system; and, so doing, involve themselves in endless difficulties, and troubles, and expenses, which do not necessarily belong to the work.

There can, of course, be not one word to say against a certain number of choirs agreeing to employ the services of one teacher. Nor can it be otherwise than well that a choral union should be able to recommend a trustworthy choirmaster to any choir that finds its home-teaching power unequal to the task of preparation for the forthcoming festival; but this should be considered rather as outside the province of the Union. What is wanted is not direct teaching, but the communication of the one way, one tempo, one style, that will be used at the contemplated service by the proposed conductor of that service; and one way, one tempo, one style, all must acknowledge must prevail in any associated service. And this may be best effected thus. As soon as the book is in hand, let the home choir-teachers meet the conductor at convenient time and place, and under him get up the service in the one uniform way to be adopted. Let this then be passed on to the several choirs by their teacher thus instructed; and as the festival day draws on, the conductor will rehearse the choirs in groups of not less than three, and so ensure that the needful uniformity is duly imparted. If the conductor duly comprehends the hot coals he will have to tread amongst, he will never cease to reiterate, "I do not come to teach, I come to convey the use of the festival day; for that service alone am I preparing you, so do not let me interfere or influence your usual style."

Now this conductor—let us give him the more dignified title of precentor—this precentor must be the heart of the whole work, whether the union be large or small. There is no fact that experience more clearly demonstrates than this, that the only form of government that will keep Choral Associations alive, when the first blush of novelty is passed, is the autocratic. As far at least as the music goes the precentor must be irresponsible dictator: he must appoint the music to be sung, left to himself to take counsel whence he may think fit; he must decide the way in which it shall be sung—if wise in his generation, adjusting to a certain extent to the more general use of the district. To place such matters in the hands of a committee is simply to court deadlock, and to set a trap for dissension and angry feeling.

It is a real work that has to be done, a work that the ordinary committee opinion-giving will only clog and hinder. Let those who would really help the cause at once accept the fact that criticism and barren opinion will only do harm, and let them set themselves to find some special and clearly defined part of the work into which they may throw their energy and heart and so help to the successful whole.

And now to the question of direct organisation. "Let us appoint a comprehensive committee, set down a good list of vice-patrons, name our various secretaries, advertise for one or more choirmasters, offering good salaries, give them a roving commission to teach choirs, and—after the first flash of novelty, die out." No, indeed, real work that will stand is not to be done with such airy generality as this. True choral organisation has no such Minerva birth, at any rate; like most other things it can only have a small beginning. The writer of this paper has often and often again received letters from various quarters far and near running thus: "Two or three of us are desirous of improving the choirs of our neighbourhood by starting a Choral Union; can you give us any suggestions to aid us in the work?"

Here, in the desire of two or three earnest men, is the true unit of choral organisation—small truly, but of right purpose—that may ultimately leaven a whole diocese. Let me, by answering my correspondents, show how this leavening may come about.

The first step will be to decide upon the precentor. It may happen that the services of an amateur, lay or clerical, of acknowledged competency, and with time and inclination for the work, may be had. For very many reasons such amateur is the fittest for the post; and his fitness is increased fourfold if he be blessed with a wife who can aid him at his visit with her voice or at the keys.

One of these reasons is the very reason that will make the home choirmaster of any of the associated choirs the least fit for the office. One home choirmaster will most assuredly kick at a brother home choirmaster being, as he will consider it, placed over him; the amateur especially, if accompanied by his wife, will stand distinct and separate, and outside these jealousies.

If the services of an amateur cannot be secured, then let a choirman be engaged from the choir of the cathedral or other church where the service is of acknowledged excellence; and let him be given to understand that he will be expected to sing with the choirs when he meets them, not merely criticise—least of all, take the accompanist's place.

One advantage of having the amateur as precentor is that he will, if he be of the right stuff, undertake all correspondence and manage all the business. If a choirman be appointed, it will be necessary to have a secretary for this work—an incumbent of a small cure, or other unpaid worker with time and inclination; and it will be for him to arrange and attend in person, to strengthen the precentor's hands, all the meetings of home choir-teachers and rehearsals of associated choirs, and to take the general management of all matters non-musical connected with festival services.

It would be found very advisable—rather, it may be said, necessary—that the secretary should also be treasurer, and have the management and control of all money matters connected with the work. It will be found in practice that to divide the offices will double rather than halve the work.

And this brings us to that most important matter, the funds. The absolute necessity for economy cannot be too strongly impressed upon those who undertake the management of choral unions.

Even for home operations there are very few choirs that do not know the pinchings of want: impecuniosity is apparently their normal condition. It is difficult enough to raise the money, except from the parson's own pocket, for the music and books necessary for current use, so that substantial subscriptions from choirs associating must not be thought of; and it will be found in practice that it is most difficult to enforce even a light subscription from every choir—indeed, the collecting of choir subscriptions is the most annoying and unpleasant duty that falls to the choral-worker's lot.

Nor can the general subscription list be regarded as a reliable, or even legitimate, source of revenue. It must be borne in mind that every subscription must come out of some parish or other. That parish, doubtless, would be only too glad of the £1 towards its own choir expenses, especially towards the expenses of the coming festival day, if it be associated; and it will assuredly look upon the treasurer running off with that £1 with much the same feeling as the keeper views the dirty shooting-coat with swollen pockets disappearing at the other side of the squire's covert. Instead of subscriptions—that is, as a regular system—it would be well to rely for needful income upon (1) the collections after festival services, (2) the money made by the sale of the service-book to the congregation, and (3) the profit on the books and music supplied to the associated choirs; and with strict economy the funds thus raised will be found sufficient. And one grand—nay, the grand—cause of useless expense will be at once cut off if the professional precentor be paid, not by salary, but by the lesson, and that lesson alone given by arrangement with the secretary, who will thus be enabled to adjust the money so spent to the probable receipts. Let the terms be liberal as the duties required may well demand; but let the price of the lesson, be what it may, be considered to cover all expenses whatsoever.

Let us here have a few words on the precentor's special duties. Now though, as we have said before, it is no place of his directly to interfere with home uses, it is his place—his special place—to set himself stoutly to work to combat what may be termed home faults and home vices, those faults and vices that seem to come naturally of those needful never-ceasing home practices, namely, slovenly inarticulate utterance, not unfrequently in oft-recurring sentences, total omission of words, even the substitution of meaningless sounds for the words, want of attack, falsely made or utterly unmade notes, and consequent out-of-tune or no tune at all. Such faults and vices as these it is the mission of the precentor to root out, and for the rooting out of which he will plot and plan in all his work: and so the tunes he will set will be of the great Gibbons and Lawes strain, or the noble old German choral school; not all ancient or foreign surely, for there are composers living amongst us now who have given us models of the people's hymn-tune as true and real as the world has to show—great, earnest men's tunes, of that tone of thoughtfulness and purpose that seems to command irresistibly the true, round, positive note-by-note delivery and the massive deliberate tempo that Germany seems never to have lost to her great people's hymns, and that we held to so firmly in those days when three thousand voices would pour forth their metrical Psalm in one of our great traditional C. M. "Church tunes" at the preaching at "Paule's Cross," or when in York Minster that "vast, conchording unity of the whole congregational chorus came thundering in even as it made the very ground shake," to the "unutterable ravishing delight of the soul" of quaint old Thomas Mace, the lutenist.

Unison-singing will be a trusty and well-used weapon in the precentor's hands. A large proportion, if not all the verses, of the Psalms he will have chanted in unison, with varied accompaniments, looking also for the variety which is so absolutely needful in good rendering of the Psalms to p. and f., and the alternation of the upper and lower registers separately. He will also employ a unison service of the style of which we may feel with deep satisfaction we now have many perfect models by our leading church composers—a style, though doubtless the style for smaller churches, yet that seems specially adapted for the singing of united choirs.

To the anthem will the precentor look to give him occasion for somewhat advanced teaching, and with this view will it be selected. Though well within their powers, it will yet be amply sufficient to interest and draw out the careful attention of the better singers. Nor will the precentor shrink from forbidding choirs, beyond whose power he knows the anthem to be, to attempt to join in singing it; and for the double reason will he so exercise his authority—to prevent harm to the worse choir by encouraging slovenly imperfectness, and to prevent harm to the better choir by allowing their truer efforts to be thwarted and their ears misled by the discordant attempts of those who are floundering out of their depth.

As the Psalms and service will be made occasion for leading the singers to feel the charm of eloquent declamation, so may the anthem be the means of showing the delights of the pure, well-balanced vocal chord; and the wise precentor will not lose the opportunity of pointing out how all this depends upon true production of note, the proper taking of the breath, and such other matters as make up what alone can be called singing.

There yet remain parts of the service which, although, alas! in many a church they may be heard muttered or gabbled as though the words were utterly meaningless, or, at least, in no way whatever concerned those whose mouths they pass, will meet from the true precentor that reverent attention and due care which surely the most casual thought must declare they deserve—Confession, Lord's Prayer, Creed, Preces, Amen. These will all be duly rehearsed, and the three former got up in their proper phrases in deliberate utterance, whether used with or without accompaniment; and the precentor will even not think it too trivial to point out that a thinking man will make a difference in his "Amen," according as it sums up his creed, his prayer, or his thanksgiving.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 638).

IN 1837 Mendelssohn experienced what he called a "great and happy change"—that is to say, he took to himself a wife; and the assumption of new responsibilities by no means tended to check the growing seriousness with which he regarded his mission and his art. Some part of the autumn of this year he spent in England, having come over to attend the performance of "St. Paul" at a Birmingham festival. He was fêted incessantly, of course; for his charming music and scarcely less charming personality had made him a great favourite; but it is curious to observe from expressions, the genuineness of which we may not doubt, how distasteful was all this homage. He tells his mother, in a letter written soon after returning to Leipzig, that he had not "one single moment of real heartfelt enjoyment" in England; but something hereanent may be laid to the account of separation from a newly married wife. In other part the fact should be attributed to the disgust of a sensitive nature at witnessing the English treatment of Neukomm. This composer, as every reader knows, was once reckoned a great man amongst us, and held in special honour at Birmingham; but with the rising of Mendelssohn's star that of Neukomm set in clouds and darkness. The younger musician observed this, and seems to have read the lesson well. "You know," he writes, "how highly they honoured, and really overvalued him (Neukomm) formerly, and how much all his works were prized and sought after here, so that the musicians used to call him the 'King of Brummagem'; whereas on this occasion they neglected him shamefully, giving only one short composition* of his the first morning (the worst of all), and the public receiving him without the slightest attention. This is really disgraceful in men who, three years ago, knew nothing better nor higher than Neukomm's music. The only thing he can be reproached with is, that three years since he wrote an Oratorio for the Musical Festival, where effect was chiefly studied. The huge organ, the choruses, the solo instruments,—all were introduced on purpose to please the audience. People soon find this out, and it never answers; but that they should treat him with such ingratitude in return is a fresh proof of how little their favour may be relied on, and what the fruits of it are when sought after." Mendelssohn had met Neukomm not long before on a Rhine steamer, and then could only say of him to Hiller: "(He was) as polite and unapproachable as ever," but now a generous sympathy made him add: "I found him, as usual, most amiable, and as kind as ever, and I might well take example from him in a hundred things. I never met with any one who combined greater sincerity with calmness and refinement, and he is, indeed, a steady true friend." But the treatment of the elder composer at Birmingham sank deeper into the heart of the younger than even this would imply. Hence we find Mendelssohn writing again to Hiller about Neukomm, "whom they (the English) on this occasion criticised so disdainfully, and received with as much coldness and neglect—in fact set aside as completely as, three years ago, they extolled him to the skies, when they placed him above all other composers, and applauded him at every step. Of what value then is their favour? You will, no doubt, say that Neukomm's music is not worth much—there we may agree, but those who were formerly enchanted with it, and now give themselves such airs, don't know this. The whole thing made me feel most indignant, while Neukomm's calm and perfectly indifferent demeanour appeared to me the more admirable and dignified when contrasted with that of others, and I like him better than ever since this manly conduct." Without pretending to excuse the public taste, or, rather want of it, which kicked the old toy into a corner as soon as a new one entered the nursery, we should not forget to point out that Mendelssohn was "out of sorts" during this short visit to England. His real self was left behind in Germany, which fact stands forth clearly enough on a page written to Hiller from London: "Here I sit—in the fog, very cross, without my wife—writing to you because your letter of the day before yesterday required it; otherwise I should hardly do so, for I am much too cross and melancholy to-day. It's nine days since I parted from Cécile at Düsseldorf; the first few were bearable, though very wearisome, but now I have got into the whirl of London—great distances, too many people, my head crammed with business and accounts, and money matters and arrangements—and it is becoming unbearable, and I wish I were sitting with Cécile, and had let Birmingham be Birmingham, and could enjoy my life more than I can to-day. D—n it! you know what that means, don't you?" From a man in this mood any acerbity may be expected, and Mendelssohn, when he saw his opportunity, naturally poured the vials of his ill-temper upon the people who had induced him to go beyond arm's length of his young wife.

* This was his "Himmel-Fahrt," of which a critic said in the Musical World: "It reminds us of Jack Rag and his celebrated aphorism, 'There is nothing stirring but stagnation.'"

That Mendelssohn's experience and observation in England of what is called popularity suggested grave thoughts is sufficiently clear from the manner in which, after his return home, he dwelt time and again upon the necessity of never seeking it. Concerning the applause lavished upon him he wrote home: "I now see beyond doubt that all this is only bestowed on me because in the course of my work I do not in the least concern myself as to what people wish and praise and pay for, but solely as to what I consider good; and I shall now less than ever allow myself to be turned from my old path. I therefore peculiarly rejoice in my success, and I feel more confident than ever that not the smallest effort shall be made by me to ensure success, nor indeed ever has been made." To his brother Paul he said: "It is singular that in my position I might complain of the very reverse of that which troubles you. The more I find what are termed encouragement and recognition in my vocation, the more restless and unsettled does it become in my hands, and I cannot deny that I often long for that rest of which you complain. So few traces remain of performances and musical festivals and all that is personal; the people indeed shout and applaud, but that quickly passes away without leaving a vestige behind, and yet it absorbs as much of one's life and strength as better things, or perhaps even more; and the worst of this is that it is impracticable to come half out when you are once in; you must either go on the whole way or not at all. I dare not even attempt to withdraw, or the cause for which I am responsible would suffer; and yet I would gladly see that it was not merely my cause, but considered a good and universal one." On the same theme he addresses Hiller: "The only things that interest me are new compositions, and of these there is a great lack. Often, therefore, I feel as if I should like to retire altogether and not conduct any longer, but only write; and yet such a regular musical life and the duty of directing it have a certain charm. . . . I felt just the same in Birmingham; I never made such a decided effect with my music as there, and never saw the public so much or so exclusively occupied with myself individually; yet there is, even in this, something—what shall I call it?—fleeting and evanescent, which I find irksome and depressing rather than cheering." Yet again, this—considering Mendelssohn's age—singular contempt for mere popularity comes to the surface in a letter to Ferdinand David: "I feel that in every fresh piece I succeed better in learning to write exactly what is in my heart, and after all that is the only right rule I know. If I am not adapted for popularity, I will not try to acquire it; and if you think this wrong, then I ought rather to say I cannot seek after it, for really I cannot, and have no wish to be able to do so. What proceeds from within makes me glad in its outward workings also, and therefore it would be very gratifying to me were I able to fulfil the wish you and my friends express; but I can do nothing towards it or about it. So much in my path has fallen to my share without my having even once thought of it, and without any effort on my part, that it may be the case with this also; if not, I shall not grumble on the subject, but console myself by knowing that I did what I could according to my best powers and my best judgment." All these extracts tend to show that increasing experience of the world drove Mendelssohn more and more in upon himself, and made him resolve to find his mission and his reward in doing that which his instincts and his genius prompted, heedless of what might follow. But we see this more clearly in a remarkable letter to a legal friend, Conrad Schleinitz, which contains the following extract: "Individual failures and strife must not be allowed to affect the heart; there must be something to occupy and elevate it far above these isolated external things. This speaks strongly in favour of my opinion (that professions are of equal value), for it is the best part of every calling, and common to all; to yours, to mine, and to every other. Where is it that you find beauty when I am working at a quartet or symphony? Merely in that portion of myself that I transfer to it, or can succeed in expressing; and you can do this in as full measure as any man, in your defence of a culprit, or in a case of libel, or in any one thing that entirely engrosses you, and that is the great point. If you can only give utterance to your inmost thoughts, and if these inmost thoughts become more and more worthy of being expressed—all the rest is indifferent."

It must be granted that these passages do not sustain a very common notion of Mendelssohn's personality. He is often described as a "brilliant butterfly" sunning himself in the light of popularity; or as a courtier bowing lowest before the throne which had the most to grant; or as a bee settling on one flower only till another showed promise of sweeter honey. But here, in these confidential letters to his most intimate friends we see him strenuously learning the lesson that simple duty done, the rest may be left to

God. Precocious in all things, Mendelssohn was precocious in this. Usually, men discern the vanity of going about to catch the varying winds of public favour only when they are somewhat advanced in life. But our master, quickened by what he saw at Birmingham, acquired this precious knowledge before the flush of youth had passed.

A deeper note than even that expressive of Mendelssohn's sense of duty is struck in a letter, written about the same time as those already quoted, to Professor Schirmer. The professor had conveyed to him a common remark that he had become a "saint," and thus did Mendelssohn meet the charge: "So I am said to have become a saint! If this be intended to convey what I conceive to be the meaning of the word, and what your expressions lead me to think you also understand by it, then I can only say that, alas! I am not so, though every day of my life I strive with greater earnestness, according to my ability, more and more to resemble the character. I know indeed that I can never hope to be altogether a saint; but if I ever approach to be one, it will be well. If people, however, understand by the word 'saint' a pietist, one of those who lay their hands on their laps and expect that Providence will do their work for them, and who, instead of striving in their vocation to press on towards perfection, talk of a heavenly calling being incompatible with an earthly one, and are incapable of loving with their whole hearts any human being or anything on earth—then, God be praised! such an one I am not, and hope never to become as long as I live. I hope, further, that to be sincerely desirous of living piously, and really to be so, does not necessarily entail the other character. It is singular that people should select precisely this time to say such a thing, when I am in the enjoyment of so much happiness, both through my inner and outer life, and my new domestic ties as well as busy work, that I really never know how sufficiently to show my thankfulness. And as you wish me to follow the path which leads to rest and peace, believe me, I never expected to live in the rest and peace that have now fallen to my lot. I offer you a thousand thanks for your good wishes, and beg you not to be uneasy on either of these points." Upon words like these it is needless to comment. They are a very intelligible revelation of the writer's inmost heart.

Several letters of the year 1838 show in what reverence Mendelssohn continued to hold Bach and Handel; while one, addressed to the committee of the Lower Rhine Musical Festival, is capable of such significant present application as to deserve special notice. It conveys the master's opinion upon the duty of a festival committee with regard to new works, and its more important passages run thus: "The more successful the previous Cologne festival was in reference to the pieces performed, especially in Handel's work with the organ, the more important it seems to me to have at least one piece in the programme by which this year's festival may be distinguished from others, and by means of which progress may, as far as possible, be manifested. For this purpose I consider it absolutely necessary to have the name of Sebastian Bach in the programme, if only for one short piece; for it is certainly high time that at these festivals, on which the name of Handel has shed such lustre, another immortal master, who is on no one point inferior to any master, and in many points superior to all, should no longer be forgotten. The same scruples which exist in opposition to this, must also have existed in former years with regard to the works of Handel, and you are all grateful to those who, disregarding such obstacles, revealed to you treasures of sublimity and elevation. Earn for yourselves, then, similar thanks from the Rhenish friends of music by making a beginning, which is indeed difficult (for this I do not deny) and must be proceeded with cautiously, but which will certainly be attended with the best results and universally imitated." In this extract we have a motto for every festival committee, who might with advantage inscribe on the walls of their council chamber—"At least one piece by means of which progress may, as far as possible, be manifested."

Touching Handel we find a good illustration of Mendelssohn's reverence, not only for the Saxon giant's music but for its original text, in a letter to Simrock, the publisher: "Would it not be well worth while for any publisher in Germany to publish just now some of Handel's principal oratorios from the original scores? This ought to be done by subscription, which would, I think, be successful, as not one of these scores exists with us. I thought of composing the organ parts for this purpose; they must, however, appear in small notes in the score, or in notes of another colour, so that, first, those who wished it could have Handel pure; second, my organ part in addition if required, and where there was an organ; and, third, in a supplement, the organ part arranged for clarionets, bassoons, and other wind instruments of the modern orchestra, when no organ can be had. Such a score would be useful to all institutes for oratorio music, and we should at last have the true Handel in Germany, not one dipped in Mosel water and thoroughly diluted." From this it appears that the characteristic instruments of a modern orchestra were only to be connected with Handel as the alternative of a supplement, the organ being the supplement, to be used "if required"; and they the alternative, where an organ was not available. What would the master say to our present treatment of his great predecessor?—treatment which so covers Handel up with supplements that, were he not a giant indeed, we might vainly try to distinguish his features.

It is in one of the letters of the year last named (1838) that the first reference to "Elijah" appears, and, as in the case of "St. Paul," so now, the better course will be to place this and all other allusions to the same subject in one group. Having gained so much from the services of Pastor Schubring, when preparing the book of his first oratorio, Mendelssohn naturally again resorted to his clerical friend for assistance, and there would appear to have been correspondence or communication between them prior to the date of the first published letter. On the other hand it is plain that the work had advanced but a little way, if, indeed, it had gone beyond Mendelssohn's first rough sketch of the "plot." As to this, we find the composer saying, "I ought to have previously told you that the sheets you took away with you are by no means to be regarded as containing a mature design, but as a mere combination of the materials I had before me for the purpose of eventually forming a plan." In this design Schubring at once made changes, approved by Mendelssohn: "So the passage of the widow, and also of the raven, being left out is decidedly most advisable, and also the whole commencement being abridged, in order that the main points may be dwelt on to one's heart's content." But Schubring's work, so far, gave the master general and entire satisfaction: "You again render me an essential service and I feel most grateful to you: how can you ask whether I wish you to proceed in the same way? When all is so well put together I have almost nothing to do but to write music for the words." On this happy footing the two men proceeded with their book.

In the same letter Mendelssohn enlarges upon the theme of "Elijah" after his usual intelligent and earnest manner, particularly with reference to the dramatic element that underlies so much of the favour now enjoyed by the oratorio: "I figured to myself Elijah as a thorough prophet, such as we might again require in our own day, energetic and zealous, but also stern, wrathful, and gloomy; a striking contrast to the Court rabble and popular rabble, in fact in opposition to the whole world, yet borne on angel's wings. Is this the inference you also draw from the subject, and this the sense in which you conceived an affection for it? I am anxious to do justice to the dramatic element, and as you say, no epic narrative must be introduced. I am glad to learn that you are searching out the always heart-affecting sense of the scriptural words, but if I might make one observation it is that I would fain see the dramatic element more prominent, as well as more exuberant and defined—appeal and rejoinder, question and answer, sudden interruptions, &c. Not that it disturbs me, for example, Elijah first speaking of the assembling of the people, and then addressing them. All such liberties are the natural privileges of such a representation in an oratorio, but I should like the representation itself to be as spirited as possible; for instance, it annoys me that Elijah does not reply to Ahab's words, No. 16, till No. 18, various other speeches and a chorus intervening.* I should like to have had an instant and eager rejoinder," &c. A little later Mendelssohn again discusses the subject with his colleague, and leads us to infer that Schubring lagged behind somewhat as respects the dramatic form of the book: "With regard to the dramatic element, there still seems to be a diversity of opinion between us. In such a character as that of Elijah, like every one in the Old Testament, except, perhaps, Moses, it appears to me that the dramatic should predominate—the personages should be introduced as acting and speaking with fervour; not, however, for Heaven's sake, to become mere musical pictures, but inhabitants of a positive, practical world, such as we see in every chapter of the Old Testament; and the contemplative and pathetic element which you desire, ought to be entirely conveyed to our apprehension by the words and the moods of the acting personages. . . . Do not be displeased if I send you a bit of criticism along with my thanks, for such is my insufferable custom. Besides, a cold and cough make me unusually rabid to-day." This was written in December, 1838, and, thenceforward, the published letters are silent about "Elijah" till December, 1842, when we find Mendelssohn resuming the theme as though the interval had been four weeks instead of four years. Once more the "dramatic element" makes our master eloquent. Schubring still lags in rear. "I cannot endure the half-operatic style of most of the oratorio words (where recourse is had to common figures, as, for example, an Israelite, a maiden, Hannah, Micaiah, and others, and where, instead of saying 'this and that is come to pass,' they are made to say 'Alas! I see this and that happening'); I consider this very weak, and will not follow such a precedent. However, the everlasting 'He spake,' &c., is also not right. Both of these are avoided in the text; still this is, and will ever remain, one of its weaker aspects. Reflect, also, whether it is justifiable that no positively dramatic figure except that of Elijah appears. I think it is. He ought, however, at the close, at his ascension to heaven, to have something to say (or sing). Can you find appropriate words for this purpose? The second part, moreover, especially towards the end, is still in a very unfinished condition. I have not yet got a final chorus. What do you advise it to be? Pray study the whole carefully, and write on the margin a great many beautiful arias, reflections, pithy sentences, choruses, and all sorts of things, and let me have them as soon as possible." Again the letters are silent for a long time, and it is not till May, 1846, that they once more speak of the oratorio. "Elijah" was to be brought out at Birmingham in August of the same year, and, knowing Mendelssohn's extreme fastidiousness regarding the production of his music, it is surprising to discover that only a few numbers of the second part were written down in May, while even the text of the remainder had not been decided upon. The third letter to Schubring enters rather minutely into these unsettled portions, and is further of interest as showing how different were Mendelssohn's ideas then from those ultimately adopted. Thus we gather that the second part was intended to begin with the words of Jezebel, "Have ye not heard," &c., and that the composer even then desired a chorus of the people against Elijah, which feeling he gratified at Birmingham by writing "Woe to him" on the eve of performance. The letter goes on: "I am in want, too, of some words for him (Elijah) to say at, or before, or even after his ascension, and also some for the chorus. The chorus sings the ascension historically from 2 Kings ii. 11; but then there ought to be a couple of very solemn choruses. 'God is gone up' will not do, for it was not the Lord but Elijah who went up; however, something of that sort. I should like also to hear Elijah's voice once more at the close. (May Elisha sing soprano? or is this inadmissible, as in the same chapter he is described as a 'bald head'? Joking apart, must he appear at the ascension as a prophet or can he do so still as a youth?) Lastly, the passages which you have sent for the close of the whole (especially the trio for Peter, John, and James) are too historical and too far removed from the grouping of the (Old Testament) story. Still I could manage with the former if, instead of the trio, I could make a chorus out of the words; it would be very quickly done, and this will probably be the case." Looking at all this, and then at the oratorio as it stands, we have reason to be thankful that "Elijah" escaped, though narrowly, a great misfortune. Imagine Elisha singing soprano at Elijah's translation, and Peter, James, and John coming forward at the last with a trio by way of terrible anti-climax!

The day after "Elijah" was produced at Birmingham Mendelssohn wrote a description of the event to his brother Paul. This, so often quoted, must be well known, and is noteworthy only for a studied calmness of style, which, however, does not conceal deep emotion. Another letter, to Frau Frege, contains a much fuller account and also a good deal of criticism upon the character of the performance. From this it is only necessary to quote one passage containing Mendelssohn's opinion with regard to an oratorio performance in England thirty years ago: "The rich, full sounds of the orchestra and the huge organ, combined with the powerful chorus, who sang with sincere enthusiasm, the wonderful resonance in the grand giant hall, an admirable English tenor singer; Staudigl, who took all possible pains, and whose talents and powers you already well know, and, in addition, a couple of excellent second soprano and contralto solo singers, all executing the music with peculiar spirit, and the utmost fire and sympathy, doing justice not only to the loudest passages, but also to the softest pianos, in a manner which I never before heard from such masses, and, in addition, an impressionable, hushed, kindly, and enthusiastic audience—all this is indeed sufficient good fortune for a first performance. I never in my life heard a better, or, I may say, one so good, and I almost doubt whether I shall ever hear one equal to it, because there were so many favourable combinations on this occasion." So much for Mendelssohn's opinion of a first-class English performance in 1846, and we may be well content to set it against that of Mr. Charles Hallé as recently expressed at a Social Science Congress. Three months after the Birmingham performance Mendelssohn is found busy with important changes, some of which were minutely set forth in Concordia during the existence of that journal, and all of which deserve careful consideration. With reference to these our last extract shall be made. In a letter to Professor Edward Bendemann, the master said: "You recommend that the 'Sanctus' should be followed by the command of God to Elijah to resume his mission. Such was, indeed, my original intention and I think of replacing it,* but I cannot dispense with an answer from Elijah, and I think both can and ought to be there. I shall not, however, be able to bring in King Ahaziah again. The greatest difficulty in the whole undertaking was, after the manifestation of the Lord in the 'Still, small voice,' to discover a conclusion for the whole with sufficient breadth (and yet not long), and if Elijah were to be afterwards introduced again in person as a jealous and avenging prophet (in a dramatic sense) it would, in my opinion, be difficult to represent, without great circumlocution, his significance towards the new dispensation (which, however, must necessarily be alluded to), while I think it most important that, from the moment of the appearance of the Lord, all should go on in grand narrative to the close. But when you say that one of these passages should relate that he (Elijah) came down, and again came down in vain, you are quite right, and I will try to accomplish it, as I am at this moment revising the whole, and re-writing several portions before sending it to the engraver. It is singular that the passage which caused me the greatest trouble is the very one that you would like to see omitted—that of the widow. To me it seems that, by introducing some phrases (either by the chorus or otherwise) the part might become still more significant and comprehensive, whereas you prefer its being a simple narrative. After all, you are possibly right, which would be unfortunate, for I believe that in the distribution of the whole, the passage in its present expansion could not possibly be spared." The moral of all this is that an oratorio composer should think "once, twice, and even thrice," about his own plans and those of his advisers. Mendelssohn thought a fourth time, perhaps even a fifth, and the result is a perfect work.

* He did replace it in "Go, return upon thy way."

APPROPRIATE MUSIC.

By Henry C. Lunn.

Those who have thoroughly tested the subject will, we are certain, quite agree with us that one of the most difficult intellectual studies is the attempt to arrive at a satisfactory definition of a word. Its conventional signification is so generally accepted that we are rarely called upon to consider its correct meaning; and thus it is that, mistaking the relative for the absolute, we often, for example, use the word "true," unmindful of the fact that what is true in one age is false in another. We could of course multiply instances of this kind; but, confining ourselves at present to the subject of our article, let us think what is really meant when we say that certain surroundings are "appropriate" to the occasion. Assuredly, in a rough sense of the word, they may be appropriate to the event for which they are designed, but some particular circumstance, unknown or overlooked, may render them most "inappropriate." Two instances occur to us at this moment. At a wedding-breakfast a distinguished orator, who was staying in the village, but was entirely unacquainted with the family of the bride, was invited, and, thinking it probable that he might be called upon during the morning to display his powers, he partially prepared a speech "appropriate to the occasion." Gratified, as he anticipated, by being asked to "respond" to a toast, he at once credited the bridegroom with the possession of all the virtues under the sun; and, after warmly eulogizing the lady of his choice, expressed a wish that she might "imitate the example of her dear mother." At hundreds of weddings this little compliment might have been received with acclamations of delight; but as it unfortunately happened that the mother in early life had eloped with her husband's coachman, a dead silence ensued, to the utter discomfiture of the innocent and unsuspecting speaker. The inappropriateness of this circumstance was of course unknown. Now for the case in which it was overlooked. It was decided to give a dinner to a millionaire, who had in early life sold candles, oil, and birch-brooms. Various orations were to be given after dinner, and songs were introduced between the toasts; but unfortunately the vocal piece selected after the health of the hero of the evening was "Buy a broom," the very first line of which threw such a damp over the assembly that, pleading illness, the chairman vacated his place at an early hour.

Let it not be thought that we have one word to say against "appropriate music" in its highest sense. Works glorifying the various seasons of the year in imperishable notes have been bequeathed to us by the great composers of the world; and the "Messiah" of Handel, the "Christmas Oratorio" and "Passion Music" of Bach will remain as the most eloquent sermons that can be preached to intensify the events which they record. But the conventional method of selecting music which, having some kind of relation to the event for which it is chosen, is at once presumed to be "appropriate," reminds us too much of the shopkeeper, who being asked to supply a customer with something for a child to play with on Sundays, immediately recommended a Noah's Ark, because, he said, it was "mentioned in the Scriptures." The truth is that in our ordinary social intercourse we rarely think deeply enough upon these matters, and imagine that any music not glaringly "inappropriate" to an occasion must be "appropriate." An amateur singer, whose répertoire of vocal pieces is derived exclusively from the "music halls," is invited to a party, and casually hearing that there is to be "music," without troubling himself to inquire what kind of compositions are to form the staple of the programme, launches forth one of these effusions on the first opportunity, in the midst of a selection from the works of the classical writers. A lady, knowing that there is to be "singing" during one of those friendly evenings gradually becoming more frequent in the present day, in her first song, by pathetically warbling about a dying child, who passed away on a Christmas-eve, the anniversary of which they are all met to celebrate, causes such anguish of mind to two mothers in the room that not only are they debarred from any further pleasure, but also the many friends who, knowing of their bereavement, heartily sympathise with them. An ambitious pianist, finding himself at a quadrille party, feels somewhat aggrieved that during the early part of the evening he has not been asked to play. At length the pianoforte is opened, and, understanding that there is now to be "music," and thinking, we presume, that all "music" must be alike welcome, on being requested to favour the company performs straight through two Preludes and Fugues of Bach, to the utter consternation of the hostess and the many "engaged" couples whose flirtations are thus heartlessly suspended. In these three examples—all of which are within our own knowledge—it will at once be seen that want of thought of, and not disregard for, the persons by whom they were surrounded was the cause of well-meaning individuals giving much pain and annoyance.

But there can be no doubt that at many of our public establishments the very attempt to perform "appropriate music" leads to most absurd results. Handel's "Water Music" during the playing of the fountains at the Crystal Palace, or his "Firework Music" during a pyrotechnic display, certainly cannot be termed "inappropriate," although of course there is nothing abstractedly suggestive of water in the former composition, or of fire in the latter; but when we hear of "appropriate music" played before the diners at a restaurant the term ceases to convey any definite meaning. We know of no air but "The roast beef of old England" which could in any manner illustrate the occasion; and the band could not play this all day long.

"Arrangers of music" at theatres know perfectly well what is signified by the word "appropriate" as applied to accompaniments for the dramatic action on the stage. Soft music for the entry of the heroine, mysterious and tremulous music for apparitions, demoniacal music for all the underground effects, and "hurries" for combats and struggles, are composed to order in an incredibly short space of time by a skilful workman; and the model is handed down from generation to generation with but little variation. Such compositions as these may of course pass unquestioned, and even perhaps almost unnoticed, in the dramas for which they are written; but "appropriate music" for higher works must be supplied by a higher intellect; and we can now scarcely think of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" without associating it with Mendelssohn's sympathetic illustrations.

Let us then, as we have already said, before we talk of "appropriate music" attempt to define what we really mean. As we have shown, compositions suited for one occasion are utterly unsuited for another. At a recent banquet, for example, given to the heroic defenders of Rorke's Drift, much was said, in replying to the toasts, not only about the valour of the army, but about the staunch defenders of our country at sea. And so, thinking it necessary to have some music in consonance with the event, a selection, entirely vocal, was given from "H.M.S. Pinafore," in which, we need not remind our readers, everything relating to the navy is turned into rampant burlesque. Will not the many officers who were present agree with us, that never was "appropriate music" more "inappropriate"?

In the last number of the Nineteenth Century is a paper on "The Functions of the Brain," by Dr. Julius Althaus. It professes to give a summary of the latest observations on the effects caused by the application of electricity to the hemispheres of the brains of living animals. The chief result of this important step in modern research is the attempted explanation of what is familiarly known to us all as "unconscious cerebration." The subject is particularly interesting to musicians, as some curious manifestations of the mental phenomena referred to occur in the practice of music, and they are constantly chosen by physiologists as illustrations. The experiments which originated the present phase of the question were made by Fritsche and Hitzig, of Berlin, and by Dr. Ferrier in this country; and they rather tend to establish the main principle of an empirical science much in vogue thirty or forty years ago, and known as "phrenology." The foundation of phrenology is certainly the "specific localisation of cerebral faculties," and recent experiments seem to prove the existence of such localisations in at least the lower brain-centres. Dr. Carpenter, in noticing at the end of his "Mental Physiology" the results of Ferrier's experiments, takes occasion to observe, in regard to the higher mental processes, that "whether these processes be carried on volitionally or automatically, it still seems to the writer just as absurd as it formerly did to suppose that there can be special 'organs' for their performance, such as those named comparison and causality in the phrenological system." However, Dr. Carpenter's psychology dates from thirty years ago, and he comes suddenly on the experiments of Ferrier with all the preconceptions of a student of the era of Sir William Hamilton. Dr. Althaus, on the other hand, although he tells us little or nothing not contained in Dr. Carpenter's work, reminds us that modern physiology places the faculty of language in the same cerebral region indicated by Gall. In other points, and particularly in regard to the functions of the cerebellum, the mapping of the phrenologists appears to have been completely in error. How far they were in error in other respects is a question, as Dr. Althaus observes in allusion to other parts of the subject, which will be one of the greatest problems for the anatomy and physiology of the twentieth century to determine; and when such problems are solved, a complete revolution in psychology must be the result. It should be remembered that the experiments which have lately created so much interest were performed on animals under the influence of chloroform; so that what in the lower animals might correspond to the region of the intellect was in a state of torpor; and only those manifestations were visible that depend on the automatic operation of the inferior brain-centres, and amongst others the "central ganglia," which in the human brain perform mechanically what the will directs or stimulates in the common acts of life, such as walking, dressing, singing, and playing on musical instruments:

If each time (says Dr. Althaus) we do anything of that sort, a conscious effort were necessary for all the different parts of which the action is composed, the time at our disposal would not suffice for the hundredth part of the work which we actually get through in life; and some forms of activity, such as finished piano and violin playing, would be utterly impossible. . . . A key is thus furnished for the comprehension of many singular occurrences which would otherwise be quite inexplicable. A pianist, for instance, finds himself playing one of Rubinstein's sonatas by heart, and is perhaps thinking all the time of his coming trip to Switzerland, or something else which may happen to engage his attention; that is to say, the "central ganglia" play the sonata, whilst the "hemispheres" are busy elsewhere. . . . The highest development of brain matter is found in the hemispheres, convolutions or grey surface of the brain, which is the material base of all mental and moral activity. This portion of the brain is not a single organ, as was formerly supposed, but consists of a number of thoroughly differentiated organs, each of which possesses certain functions, and is yet in the closest possible connection with all the others. . . . The convolutions in the left hemisphere are more important for intellectual manifestations than the right, and it is in the third left frontal convolution where the faculty of expressing ideas in words exists. This discovery was foreshadowed by Gall, but actually made by Broca. . . . Talking, writing, drawing, &c., are habitually done by the left hemisphere alone, while both hemispheres have to be trained for musical performance. Pianists educate them both equally, whilst violinists and 'cellists have to train them dissimilarly; and this is probably the reason why it requires more practice and is more difficult to play upon stringed-instruments than on the piano.

To many of us who pride ourselves on our manual dexterity and brilliant performances on musical instruments, it is not agreeable to find that our skill is so dependent on the activity of the lower motor-centres of the brain, and on such things as "ganglia," which appear to "play sonatas" if they do not compose them. Fortunately, there are the psycho-motor centres more closely in contact with the seat of the reasoning faculties; and the modern scientist seems inclined to pet music, and admit that the highest centres are actively employed in its intelligent pursuit. In fact, it is the exceedingly complex nature of the musical art in any of its branches, which is at once the secret of the pleasure it affords to its votaries, and its protection against depreciative attacks. As for the ancient type of literary solemnity, who is tolerant of no æstheticism not bound in vellum, or printed in black letter or in Greek text, his race is all but extinct; although occasionally he still appears in a third leader in a London newspaper, when the daily "copy" is not abundant. Scientific culture and habits of thought seem to be growing more and more essential in the literature of the present day; and it is satisfactory to musicians to discover that, whether the particular question be the "functions of the brain" or the revelations of physical science, the more fearlessly we probe the secrets of our nature, the more certainly will he and his art be dragged to the front in intellectual discussions. The figure he will play as an individual depends very much on his own efforts, and on whether he chooses to bury himself in the special knowledge or charms of his art, or whether he chooses to widen the scope of his information and prove that, in common with the highest and most intellectual pursuits there is much in the practice of his art which is purely automatic, he is not himself an automaton. There is no subject in which the thoughtful experience of the musician will be so valuable as in "this most important step in modern research" to which Dr. Althaus alludes in the Nineteenth Century. It is part of the daily reflections and conversation amongst musicians to estimate in themselves and their pupils the relative values of "work," of "talent," and of "genius." The subject has hitherto been treated in vague generalities, and obscured by sentimentalism, and not unfrequently disfigured by well-meant but homely moralising in the labor omnia vincit vein, a proverb conveying a partial truth often more injurious to the young than an absolute misstatement. It is the province of science or of mental physiology to dispel such errors, to define genius, and to limit our hopes and direct our labours according to our organisation, so that our lives may not be wasted in vain aspirations.

Assuredly this is the age of "methods," and we would counsel all, therefore, who have invented a system by which anybody can acquire the art of music with scarcely any trouble or expense to "make hay while the sun shines;" for rivals are rapidly springing up on all sides. Only a short time ago we drew attention to the advertisement of one who undertook to teach those who know nothing of music how to play on the pianoforte or harmonium for elevenpence. Now we are favoured with a prospectus from a professor who styles himself the "Inventor of the Fork-Lightning System," by which, he says "any person can play immediately, after reading the instructions, on the piano or harmonium, without study, although they might never have touched the keys of an instrument before." The dazzling effect of the words "Fork-Lightning" fancifully written in blood-red ink at the commencement of the prospectus prepares the reader for the variegated colours in the page of "instructions," by the aid of which the student is said to be enabled to play "Home, sweet home." How this feat is accomplished we cannot exactly say; but, according to the inventor, by fitting the given card over the key-board of the pianoforte, striking a key with the right hand pointed out by what is termed a "red or white tongue," and then glancing along a line, either to the right or left to see what the next is to be, playing some "quickly," and "pausing" on others (though it is not said how quickly, or how long we are to pause), out will come "Home, sweet home." Equally clear directions are given for the left hand, so that it is impossible for the dullest person to go wrong, or at least, if he does, he may have the satisfaction of knowing that it is his own fault. The discoverer of this system, it appears, does not rely exclusively upon "Forked-Lightning." He has another method for those who wish a higher course of instruction, superior to any yet known; in proof of which he writes, "Cases undertaken by me where 6, 9, 12, and more years had been wasted on attempts, has been productive, under my new method, of glorious results." After giving his address, he says, "Please note, as a guide at night, 'The Transparency'." Let us hope that this is not a sign emblematical of his systems.

We have lately been asked by a correspondent if we could tell him whether we had ever heard of any instance in which a vocalist has broken his collar-bone in attempting to reach the high notes of his voice. We cannot say that we know of such a case, but as the very question seems to imply that there is danger in forcing the vocal organs, it would be good, we think, to warn the lady who was recently summoned for singing too loudly at church that such a result is possible. It appears that this ultra zealous member of the congregation was in the habit of singing "at the topmost pitch of her voice," and that—in consequence, we presume, of her vocal power being superior to her musical knowledge—she was generally a "little before" or a "little after" the choir. She had been remonstrated with by the officials and the churchwardens; but, in spite of this, she continued her conduct; and the vicar had even gone so far as to declare that he would put a stop to the singing altogether unless the lady was either silenced or brought under proper subjection. In defence, she said that "her whole heart and soul were in the service of the Church, which she had attended for twenty-seven years." She had always felt that she was doing her duty in singing during the service, but candidly confessed that "her voice was very high." Thus much perhaps it was necessary to admit, in justification of her drowning the other vocalists; but after protesting that she had not the slightest intention of annoying any one, she boldly changed her apologetical tone, and asserted that "she thought the choir broke down a great deal more when she did not sing than when she did." This was certainly "rebutting the evidence" with spirit; and we cannot but think that the vicar, churchwardens, and congregation will find her an awkward person to deal with. It is true that the magistrate hinted at a probable £5 fine; but may we again suggest that some person should throw across her future the shadow of the catastrophe we have already hinted at? She would not mind paying £5 for the luxury of singing "at the topmost pitch of her voice," but we question whether she would like to break her collar-bone.

Instances have occurred within our recollection where an excellent drama has been produced with signal success, and simply because the actor or actress identified with the principal part has either been taken ill or seceded from the company, the piece has been laid aside, and scarcely ever afterwards heard of. Whether this arise from the selfish caprice of the original representative of the character, who, on the principle of the "dog in the manger," refuses to allow any other to play a part which he or she can no longer fill, or from the fact of the public having so associated the individualities of one artist with the character that no other will be accepted, we cannot say; but certain it is that it has a bad effect upon the drama; for by placing the actor above the author the writer becomes a mere lackey to those whose fame he has really created. At the Opera for many years the same method has been pursued, and has acted most deleteriously upon the public taste. A prima donna takes possession of an Opera, and the presentation of the work is henceforth dependent upon the engagement of this vocalist at the establishment where the Opera is originally represented; for not only will no equally good singer undertake the part in that company but in any other, the tacit reason being, we presume, that she will not give the public a chance of instituting comparisons. Happily, Mr. Mapleson has, during his autumn and winter season, so thoroughly abolished this vicious principle that we much doubt whether, at his establishment at least, it will ever be again acted upon. The heroines in his most attractive operas—not even excepting "Carmen"—have been cast in turns to the best singers in the company; and thus the public is afforded an opportunity of hearing different readings of the same parts. We may now perhaps find that even "fashionable" people can go to the Opera rather to hear the music than the vocalists.

AT the annual series of "Promenade Concerts" in the metropolis, it has always been a question whether the refreshments are to be looked upon as an accompaniment to the music, or the music as an accompaniment to the refreshments. It may, of course, be said that as both are held out as inducements to the general public, there can be no reason for too curiously inquiring which most engages the attention of the lessees; but this is a mistake, for there can be no doubt that if grottoes, mirrors, and marble tables are profusely scattered over the building, the music must act but a secondary part in the evening's amusement. In the conduct of the recently established "Temperance Music Halls," however, those who have their direction must be very cautious not to take pattern by these popular entertainments, by thinking too lightly of the mental fare provided; for they may rest assured that a diminution in the attraction of the refreshments must be compensated for by an increase in the attraction of the music. A case strongly illustrating this fact has lately occurred at Liverpool. It appears that a Coffee Music Hall has been opened, in the arrangements of which it is said "great attention was paid to temperance, but very little to music." As the performers appeared to be totally incapable—one indeed proclaiming from the stage that he had never before been in a theatre in his life—the auditors took the liberty of expressing their very decided dissatisfaction; and so, we are informed, "after a very few performances the attempt collapsed." So far from blaming the visitors to this "People's Concert," we are glad to hear that they spoke out in so unmistakable a manner. A man does not go to a Music Hall to practise temperance, but to hear music; and if the music is not worth his hearing, he will assuredly not be tempted there by the mere absence of strong liquors.

IN a recent number of that excellent and useful weekly journal, Replies, we perceive that an attempt has been made by a correspondent (in whose initials, "C. K. S.," we recognise a frequent contributor to our own pages) to answer the following question: "Can you give me the origin and precise meaning of 'higher development,' as applied to pianoforte playing?" Now, of course it is easy enough to give the "origin" of this term, because, as everybody knows, it was invented by a knot of artists, either of foreign extraction, or with strong foreign proclivities, to designate a certain school of pianoforte-playing, for the furtherance of which an Academy has been founded; but to describe its "precise meaning" is a task which we have vainly endeavoured to perform, and which "C. K. S." himself has not more successfully grappled with. True it is that he tells us what it is not, but only in the gentlest manner hints at what it is—or rather what it may be. "Carrying our memory back to a period of more than half a century," he says, "we recall the great performances of the illustrious masters of the pianoforte," and then he mentions a number of the grandest artists, amongst whom are natives of England, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia. As none of these pianists have termed themselves apostles of "higher development" what it is not is of course evident. What it is, or may be, is thus shadowed forth: "Exaggerated readings of the classic works of Beethoven and other great masters, illustrated by unauthorised changes of time, by substituting Andantes for Adagios, and Prestos for Allegros and Allegrettos, have been long noticeable in the performances of some pianists, even of the most exalted fame. Shall we call this a higher development?" We pause for a reply.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE winter season of Italian Opera, which terminated on the 13th ult., has, like the autumn season, been entirely devoted to repetitions of well-worn works. The appearance of Madame Hélène Crosmond as Elsa in Wagner's "Lohengrin," at a morning performance, deserves, however, special record, for, despite the success of her predecessors in this arduous part, she fully succeeded in enlisting the sympathies of her audience, and elicited warm and well-deserved applause throughout. The steady advance of Madame Marie Roze in public estimation must also be chronicled. No artist has more fairly won her way to the position she now enjoys; and we are glad to find that her reception by the aristocratic frequenters of the establishment has been even exceeded in cordiality by what may be termed the more "popular" audiences lately appealed to. The theatre will be reopened by Mr. Carl Rosa on the 10th inst. for the performance of Operas in English.

ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

No one expects novelties, which demand time for preparation, at the beginning of a season, and therefore it would be absurd to express either surprise or disappointment at the familiar way in which the above Society has commenced the work of its ninth year. Well-known music must have been expected, and critical interest looked forward to nothing save what the initial performances might show of the numerical and artistic resources of an institution that, in its time, has done good service, and will, with proper encouragement, do more. The second concert took place on November 27, when Haydn's "Creation" was given under Mr. Barnby's direction with as much efficiency as "Elijah" had been rendered on the highly successful opening night. There was not, however, so large an audience, for reasons by no means obscure. Popular as the "Creation" may be, it yields in that respect to "Elijah," while with the execution of Mendelssohn's Oratorio was associated the singing of Madame Albani. These two facts are quite able to explain the falling-off in attendance, even if it were at all reasonable to look twice in succession for such an enormous gathering as that of the "Elijah" night. But there was no abatement in the merit of the work done, and especially should the choir be commended for an admirable delivery of the choruses, which, though subordinate in numbers and importance to the solos, are nevertheless capable of much effect. The one really grand and fully developed number—by which, of course, we mean "The heavens are telling"—was given with admirable strength and expression, leaving, in point of fact, very little, if anything, to be desired. It is always a matter of concern when soloists have to be chosen for the "Creation," so much real vocal skill and power do Haydn's graceful airs demand. But the difficulty was well surmounted in the present case. As sopranos go, to whom the English tongue is native, very few are better than Mrs. Osgood, and the American lady's singing of music with reference to which every amateur is a critic, met with marked commendation. That the efforts of Mr. Edward Lloyd were equally fortunate goes without saying. The "Creation" songs suit his voice and style in a particular degree—always excepting, of course, the air, "Now vanish," which every tenor would willingly give up—and his delivery of "In native worth," so smooth, well-phrased, and expressive, was one of the evening's greatest successes. Signor Foli lent the attraction of his sonorous voice to the bass solos, and completed a triad of artists that need not, on the whole, avoid comparison with others of earlier and more vaunted times. Mr. Barnby conducted with the firmness and intelligence so often remarked upon.

The third Concert took place on the 11th ult, and was devoted to "Judas Maccabæus," given under the special conditions first introduced at the performance of the previous season. As regards the employment of a military band in Handel's martial oratorio, we can add nothing to previous observations; nor can we take anything away. The matter simply stands thus: If it be allowable to change Handel's score from what it was as it left the composer's hands, then the nature of the change becomes simply a question of taste. Handel's scores are always altered, and that which is universally tolerated cannot be considered as disallowed. Therefore, the military band in "Judas" must be criticised, for practical purposes, from the stand-point of propriety, and that its use in the more warlike numbers heightens their effect we consider as beyond question. It may, no doubt, be said that, however tolerated, an addition to the master's score is an offence, and the objection opens up a grave matter. But it takes in Mozart's extra accompaniments to the "Messiah" as well as the military band in "Judas," and therefore is a general topic with which we are not now specially concerned. The band assisting on the occasion referred to was that of the Coldstream Guards, the practised skill of the military musicians making Mr. Barnby's task in directing his augmented force one of complete assurance. In the numerous and splendid choral numbers of Handel's work the choir had abundant opportunities of exhibiting its powers, and took full advantage of them; but the effect made in "O Father, whose Almighty power," "Hear us, O Lord," "Fallen is the foe," and "We never will bow down" being in each case worthy the magnificent theme, and sustaining the just repute of English oratorio singing. Miss Anna Williams took the principal soprano solos, and made an impression deeper, perhaps, than ever before. Alike in "Pious orgies" and the highly-contrasted air "From mighty kings" Miss Williams was equal to her task. Her colleague in the soprano department was Miss Carina Clelland, while the contralto songs were taken by Madame Mary Cummings. Mr Joseph Maas, who is not so well known in oratorio by Londoners as by the amateurs of Birmingham and other places, won a distinct success as principal tenor. Beginning well with "Call forth thy powers," he went on better with "How vain is man," and reached a climax in the exciting "Sound an alarm." It is quite safe to say that the future of Mr. Maas as an oratorio singer lies in his own hands. The bass soloist of "Judas" has not much to do, but Herr Henschel did it well, obtaining marked applause for "The Lord worketh wonders," wherein he showed himself thoroughly conversant with Handel's most characteristic manner. After this it is almost superfluous to add that the general performance of the Oratorio sustained the credit of the Society.

The usual Christmas performance of the "Messiah" was announced for the evening of Boxing Day.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

MR. SHAKESPEARE'S Piano Concerto in C major was the special novelty of the Crystal Palace Concert on November 29. Some of our readers will be aware that Mr. Shakespeare originally entered the musical profession as a pianist, though he subsequently abandoned this branch of the art in favour of singing. Unlike too many of our vocalists, he is also an excellent musician. The Concerto given at Sydenham was composed several years ago, and is the same work which was performed at Mr. Kuhe's last Brighton Festival, the soloist on that occasion, as on this, being Miss Annette Kuhe. The work was so fully analysed in these columns, in our notice of the Brighton Festival, that it is needless to say more than that a second hearing of the music confirmed the opinion then expressed, and that the solo part was well rendered by Miss Kuhe. A charming little symphony by Haydn, entitled "La Chasse," from the character of its finale, was given on the same afternoon for the first time at these concerts. It is not one of Haydn's greatest orchestral works; but it is full of delightful melody, the graceful slow movement and the finale being especially pleasing. The rest of the programme consisted of pieces more or less familiar at the Crystal Palace, including Brahms's clever and interesting variations for orchestra on a Theme by Haydn, Handel's Largo in G (Hellmesberger's arrangement), the Overture to "Der Freischütz," and vocal numbers by Madame Sherrington and Mr. Shakespeare.

The first appearance at the Crystal Palace of the composer, pianist, and organist, M. Camille Saint-Saëns was the principal feature of the concert on the 6th ult. M. Saint-Saëns, it is scarcely necessary to remind amateurs, occupies a conspicuous position among living French musicians, and has been more than once heard in London, though not previously at Sydenham. He brought forward on this occasion his third Concerto for piano, in E flat. Like most of the composer's music, the work challenges our admiration for its cleverness more than it appeals to the heart; it seems to have been carefully thought out rather than deeply felt. From this general criticism, however, we must except the slow movement, the themes of which are charming. The whole work, which is somewhat irregular in form, is ingeniously constructed, and brilliantly scored. The pianoforte part is immensely difficult; but M. Saint-Saëns performed it with a technical mastery, and an apparent ease, which showed him to be a pianist of the highest rank. At the same concert M. Saint Saëns also conducted his symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale"—an unpretentious little piece, very pleasing in its themes, interesting in its treatment, and charmingly orchestrated. Both works were very warmly received by the audience. The symphony of the afternoon was Schumann's No. 4 (in D minor), in which, as well as in the "Tannhäuser" overture, which concluded the concert, Mr. Manns's band was heard to special advantage. The celebrated Crystal Palace orchestra has certainly never played more finely than during the present season.

Mr. Manns being absent to fulfil his engagement at the Glasgow Orchestral Concerts, his place was filled on the 13th ult. by Mr. H. Leslie, who brought his choir with him. The first part of the concert was occupied by a performance of Mendelssohn's music to "Antigone." Though not one of the most frequently heard of its composer's works, the music is quite sufficiently known to render criticism superfluous; it will be enough to say a few words on the performance. The male voices of Mr. Leslie's choir did full justice to the music, the popular "Hymn to Bacchus" creating especial enthusiasm. The incidental lyrics were extremely well read by Mr. Charles Fry, who left nothing to desire either in clearness of enunciation or appropriateness of expression. The "Antigone" was followed by a miscellaneous selection, comprising Bach's motett for a double choir, "The Spirit also helpeth us"—one of the great show-pieces of Mr. Leslie's choir—

Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and Morley's ballet "My bonny lass she smileth"—in all which pieces the choir was heard to advantage. A new singer, Mdlle. Marie Breidenstein, made her first appearance in Weber's recitative and air, "Non paventar," without any great success. The lady has a fine voice, but is at present far from being a finished artist. Mr. Henry Guy sang Balfe's serenade "Good night, beloved," and the overture to "Ruy Blas" concluded the concert.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Four evening Concerts were given by this institution during the past month, previous to the usual adjournment for the Christmas vacation, viz., on the 1st, 8th, 15th, and 22nd respectively, the programmes offering, as usual, numerous attractions to the lover of classical chamber-music. At the first-named concert Madame Norman-Néruda introduced, as in the previous month, a string quartet by Haydn, which had not been performed here before, viz., that in E major (Op. 17, No. 1), which was played in excellent style by the lady referred to, who was assisted by MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. This bright and genial composition, with its somewhat antiquated leading theme in the first movement, its graceful minuet, its busy and vivacious finale, was evidently much appreciated by the audience, and will doubtless meet with a repetition before long, although some thirty-five similar works by this prolific composer as yet await their introduction to the frequenters of these concerts. The pianist on this occasion was Mr. Charles Hallé, who played with his well-known lucidity and finish Beethoven's Sonata in D major. Signor Piatti received a perfect ovation after his performance of Locatelli's Sonata in D major, originally written for the violin and transcribed for the instrument of which Signor Piatti is such a consummate master. He was most ably supported by M. Zerbini, who played the pianoforte accompaniment. The concert concluded with an admirable rendering on the part of Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé of Beethoven's so-called Kreutzer Sonata, for violin and pianoforte, a great favourite with this, as indeed with any other audience, and which elicited the usual rounds of applause. Herr Henschel was the vocalist, and contributed an Aria from Handel's opera "Rinaldo," as well as two songs by Schubert. The singer accompanied himself on the pianoforte, a proceeding admirably adapted to the drawing room, but scarcely to a public performance in a large hall; for whatever the performance under such circumstances may gain in artistic sympathy, is more than counterbalanced by the want of directness of appeal to the audience on the part of the singer. We fancy Herr Henschel will not be long in recognising the truth of these remarks. His double performance was, however, an admirable one, and resulted in the usual calls for an encore.

At the second Concert of the month M. Sainton was the leading violinist, in which capacity he played, in conjunction with MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze, Mendelssohn's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 13), and Haydn's String Quartet in G major (Op. 77, No. 1), both works being rendered in a masterly manner, as indeed the mere mention of the names of these artists sufficiently indicates. Mdlle. Janotha reappeared after her recent indisposition, and gave a very poetic reading of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in E minor (Op. 90). This is the Sonata dedicated to Count Moritz Lichnowski, consisting of two movements only, in which the love-romance of the Count is said to have found its musical illustration. However that may be (it is Schindler who first related the circumstance), the work in question is one which demands a distinct artistic individuality on the part of its exponent, a quality which Mdlle. Janotha possesses in a marked degree, and which partly explains the fact of her having so rapidly become a favourite at these concerts. Miss Hope Glenn sang Beethoven's well-known concert Aria "In questa tomba," as well as Sterndale Bennett's "Castle Gordon," there being an absence of artistic warmth in the lady's delivery which may, perhaps, have been the result of nervousness. The concluding number of the programme consisted of two pieces by representative composers of the modern German school, written for two pianofortes, the one entitled "La Belle Griseldis," called by its composer (C. Reinecke) an "Improvisata," but treated in the regular form; the other being a "Tarantelle" by Joachim Raff (Op. 84, No. 12). These interesting compositions were well executed by Misses Hopekirk and Ockleston. Sir Julius Benedict acted as accompanist, an office in the discharge of which he greatly excels.

The third Concert referred to brought a repetition of Haydn's genial Quartet in B flat major (Op. 50, No. 1), which had been first introduced to the audience in the previous month, and whose interest in the work has evidently gained by the second hearing. Haydn is so talkative, and at the same time he has so much to say that is worth listening to, that his quartets require a repetition in order to be fully appreciated, albeit "good old Haydn" is now-a-days looked upon by some as a composer whose works have long since been superseded and may be understood at a glance. Mdlle. Janotha was again the pianist, and reaped endless applause in her characteristic rendering of a Capriccio in B minor, by Brahms, a Romance by Madame Schumann, and the Novelette in B minor by Schumann, which was encored. The vocalist was Miss Lillian Bailey, whose bright voice told well in her delivery of Bach's joyous Pfingst-Cantate, "Mein gläubiges Herze," although her singing was evidently somewhat influenced by nervousness. The second vocal portion of the programme were two songs written by Herr Henschel and sung with much spirit by the lady just mentioned, the composer accompanying on the pianoforte. Beethoven's beautiful and ever-popular Septet—played here for the thirty-fourth time—concluded the programme, the executants being Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Zerbini, Clinton, Wendtland, Wotton, Reynolds, and Pezze. Signor Piatti at this, as in the previous Concert, was prevented by indisposition from occupying his regular post at the violoncello.

For the last Concert of the month the following programme had been announced: Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), a Pianoforte Sonata by Beethoven, Mozart's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in F major, and songs by Handel and Buononcini; the executive artists being Mesdames Norman-Néruda and Janotha, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze; vocalist, Mr. F. King. We must defer our notice of the performance until our next number. These Concerts will be resumed on the 5th inst.

HERR HENSCHEL'S CONCERT.

A very remarkable Concert was given on the 2nd ult. in St. James's Hall, by Herr Henschel. The German baritone is an ambitious man, as every one whom Heaven has specially gifted should be within fair and honourable limits; wherefore, though known and respected for his vocal powers, he could hardly rest satisfied in obscurity as a composer. One or two works from his pen had been publicly heard prior to the event of which we speak, but they were comparatively slight in texture, and by no means revealed their author's capacity as he would have it understood. It is difficult, however, even for a man in Herr Henschel's position to command opportunities of showing what he can do on a large scale; the best proof of which is that Herr Henschel determined to perform his works at his own cost and charge, placing the enterprise under the ægis of charity, and seeking therewith to pecuniarily benefit not himself but the Victoria Hospital for Children. In this manner the Concert was invested with pretensions that attracted besides connoisseurs of music, many who sympathise with afflicted humanity in its most touching and pathetic aspect. We may add that the performance took place under the patronage of the Princess Louise, who is deeply interested in the welfare of the Hospital, and who, with the Duke of Edinburgh and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, was present on the occasion. Herr Henschel spared neither pains nor money with a view to satisfactory results. He engaged a large and efficient orchestra; his chorus was chosen from the members of the Albert Hall Choral Society, and if his soloists were comparatively unknown to fame, it could not be said that they were unequal to their assigned tasks. Thus equipped, and with the concert-giver and Mr. Barnby as joint conductors, the venture promised well, and, as will be seen, achieved no little.

WITH AN APPENDIX BY

JOSEPH BENNETT

Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Bennett is well-known to English musicians as one of our ablest critics. A musician himself, he adds to remarkable insight and critical judgment—intensified by long experience—the gift of a fine, lucid, and nervous English style. . . . As a permanent record of these famous performances, Mr. Bennett's little book cannot be too highly recommended, and those amateurs who wish to have a general idea of Wagner's theories will find them described in language less enthusiastic certainly than in the letters of the composer's avowed disciples, but without prejudice, and above all without a trace of intention to ridicule. . . . In the appendix are interesting sketches of Nuremberg and Salzburg, and an account of a visit to the graves of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert."—Manchester Examiner.

STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM.

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.
BOSTON, NEW YORK, AND PHILADELPHIA: DITSON & CO.

But the most remarkable feature in the whole scheme was the programme—one of those uncompromising selections which make no concession to prevalent weaknesses, but assume that if the public are not up to the mark of classical music it is necessary, for shame's sake, to act as though they were. Herr Henschel, like Herr Joachim, is a friend and admirer of Brahms, and what, in the programme of his Concert, was not by the entrepreneur himself was from the pen of his gifted countryman. Thus, the Concert opened and closed with Brahms, the central position being occupied by Henschel with two works, both of them novelties. One of these—the Psalm, "Out of darkness"—has lately been reviewed in our columns among the publications of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and was discussed at such length, with the help of musical examples, that it is unnecessary now to go over the same ground. Enough that the merits then pointed out, and others not visible on the pages of a pianoforte score, were undeniably manifested, and that the claim of the work to English favour on the ground of dignified character and musicianly skill was fully established. A more useful or more "safe" composition for Concerts that devote one half of the evening to sacred music could not be found among recent productions. The performance, which Mr. Barnby conducted, was on the whole excellent. Few difficulties being presented by the choral numbers, they received ample justice at the hands of the choir, while Miss Lillian Bailey, Mr. Boyle, and Herr Henschel rendered the solos in a manner open to little, if any, reproach. Herr Henschel was, of course, unchallengeable as an interpreter of his own music; while Miss Bailey, as his pupil, reflected in all she did the composer's exact feeling, and added to them the force of her own bright intelligence and excellent method. The concert-giver's second work was a setting of Lord Byron's lyric "O weep for those that wept by Babel's stream," two bass voices and a full orchestra with harps and two violoncelli obbligati being employed. In this the composer appears to singular advantage, and excites expectations which it is to be hoped he will not disappoint. The music is expressive, far beyond common, but utterly free from trickery. Dignified in character and poignant in utterance, it illustrates the happy medium between dry scholasticism and mere "gush," while the scoring shows Herr Henschel to be a master of that branch of his art. The scope of the work is, no doubt, very limited, owing to repetitions, but even within such narrow limits a good deal is compressed, and we do not go too far in saying that the composer has in this case gained the respectful attention of amateurs for anything he may choose to bring forward at a future time. Herr Henschel and Mr. King gave the voice parts every advantage by a careful interpretation, and, at the close, the composer-executant was loudly applauded.

Of the two works by Brahms, one was no stranger to the large gathering of connoisseurs, many of whom had heard the Symphony (No. 1) in C minor either at Cambridge, where it was first played to an English audience, or at the Crystal Palace, or at a Philharmonic Concert. Herr Henschel might have found a greater novelty in its recent successor, but his actual choice needs no defence. We should be the last to disparage the merits of the Symphony (No. 2) in D, but we should also be last to admit an equality of value with the earlier work, wherein Brahms approaches more nearly the lofty standard set by the great masters, if, indeed, he does not actually reach it, and entitle himself to a place among the glorious company. This, however, is not the time for discussion upon the point thus raised. Enough that Herr Henschel made a good selection, and that under his careful and intelligent guidance the orchestra well interpreted the symphony. We might, perhaps, if disposed to be hypercritical, take exception to one or two of Herr Henschel's tempi, but, as Mendelssohn indicated when he scoffed at the metronome, this is a matter of feeling, as to which, within limits, musicians may legitimately differ. The second work representative of Brahms was altogether a novelty in this country, although destined, it may be, to a foremost place among those which will hand his name down to posterity. We refer to the "Triumphlied," written in commemoration of the Franco-German war, and dedicated to the Kaiser Wilhelm. It is possible now to judge this work in a purely musical sense. The "angry passions" excited by the event which inspired it have subsided, and, although Englishmen may have their own opinions as to the way in which the "triumph" here celebrated was provoked, those opinions are not now dominant enough to create prejudice. A German moreover would naturally look at the "world-earthquake" of 1870-71 from a German point of view, which, of course, admits the fullest extent of feeling, whether elegiac, as in Brahms's "Requiem," or jubilant as in Hiller's "Song of Victory," Wagner's "Kaiser March," and the still more elaborate composition now under notice. The "Triumphlied" is, as becomes it, peculiarly German, both in musical style and pervading earnestness. With respect to its text, we need hardly point out that conventional lines are followed. The "God of battles" is praised with endless "Hallelujahs," on the assumption—which, if there be a God of battles, was well founded—that He always ranged Himself on the side of the Germans. Once, however, the beaten track is departed from, and here Brahms lays himself open to the charge, whether deservedly or not, of identifying the Prussian King with the Apocalyptic Warrior who went forth "conquering and to conquer." If the introduction of this august figure have no reference to the aged gentleman who was saluted emperor in the palace dedicated to the glories of France, then it has no significance at all, and we confess an extreme repugnance to it in any case. This, however, lies outside the question of musical worth, about which no doubt can exist. Some critics have seen in the "Triumphlied" the influence of Handel. For ourselves, we are able to detect nothing of the kind. Brahms has submitted rather to that of Bach, and his work is a reflection of the Leipzig master surrounded by the accessories of modern art. Composed for the full orchestra of our day, and for a double chorus, but nearly always in subservience to the severe scholasticism of Bach's style, the "Triumphlied" is a curious and striking exemplification of what may be done in the matter of blending old essentials and new details. As such it deserves grave attention. But it errs on the side of excessive difficulty. Not only are the double choruses elaborate and involved, but the separate parts are sometimes unvocal to an unusual degree. Like his great exemplar Brahms treats the voice as though it were an instrument to be played upon with mechanical certainty, and to this must be attributed the ineffective performance of not a few passages. The choir, robbed by division of the confidence and strength due to numbers, sang with timidity, less through any fault of their own than as the result of music written without regard to the nature of the means employed. The voice demands vocal music, not such as would be given to a clarionet or bassoon—a fact which the old German masters never recognised, or, at best, did so slowly and in part. All the same must this "Triumphlied" be looked upon as a grand work, of lofty character and severe proportions, like some stern old Doric temple. It is a masterpiece of scholarly composition, and, if not destined to the popularity of music more easily appreciated, will ever command the respect and admiration of those who are enlightened worshippers at the shrine of art. The performance, as already indicated, was not entirely perfect, owing to manifest unfamiliarity with the difficulties to be encountered, but it conveyed a fair idea of Brahms's purpose, and excited a desire for closer acquaintance in time to come. Herr Henschel, who seemed to have every bar in his head, conducted with unflagging zeal, and him we must doubly thank, not only for making the work known to us but for superintending its execution in a manner otherwise unattainable.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN'S CONCERT-TOUR.

THIS gifted artist, whose eminent and varied qualities both as pianist and composer it has been for years the privilege of English audiences to appreciate and admire, is just now engaged, for the first time, upon a Concert-tour in different parts of Germany. Miss Zimmermann, as is well known, though born at Cologne, owes her musical education to this country, she having been a distinguished pupil of our Royal Academy of Music, and her present début at the musical centres of her native land must therefore be looked upon as an important event of her artistic career. That the faultless technique, the artistic earnestness and thoughtfulness, which characterise the lady's interpretations, should meet with due recognition in an eminently musical country was, indeed, almost a foregone conclusion. Nevertheless, the fact must be highly gratifying to the artist, as well as to her numerous English friends, that from the commencement of her visit in Germany the reception accorded to her has been everywhere of the most flattering nature. At Düsseldorf, Hamburg, Brunswick, Berlin, Leipzig, where she has hitherto appeared at various concert-institutions, her success has been most marked, as may be gathered from the notices contained in the local organs of the press. An enumeration of the programmes of concerts in which Miss Zimmermann took part will be found in the column of this journal usually reserved for that purpose. As regards the estimate taken by German critics of the lady's qualifications, it will be of interest to our readers if we offer an extract from a fairly representative notice, published in the Berlin Tribune of the 4th ult. That journal, referring to a musical soirée given by Miss Zimmermann, with the co-operation of Herren Joachim and Hausmann, says: "The execution of the pianoforte part of Beethoven's Trio in B flat major (Op. 97) was, apart from the unerring precision in the surmounting of its technical difficulties, throughout a combination of exhaustive study, of an intimate entering into the poetic intentions of the composer, and of a refined taste. Whoever can play like this has followed the manifestations of genius step by step, until the secret of his realisation of the beautiful has quite revealed itself. . . . The Sonata in G minor (Miss Zimmermann's, for pianoforte and violin) is a grandly conceived work in four movements, which alone should be sufficient to testify to the composer's artistic maturity. Among the truly remarkable productions with which in these latter days 'woman' has entered into competition with man, this sonata may certainly lay claim to the fullest recognition, albeit that to our thinking the scherzo, which was most favourably received, appeared, because of its mazurka style, somewhat out of keeping with the rest. . . . It was, however, in her rendering of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, where the entire individuality, and the highest artistic emotion of the pianist became manifest. . . . As far as we can remember, only Hans von Bülow is in the same degree capable of initiating us into the secrets of that composer, and it is in this direction especially where we hope soon to meet the artist again."

Miss Zimmermann was expected to play at one of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig during the early part of this month, and it is needless to add that we shall continue to follow her artistic progress in Germany with much interest.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THIS Society continues its good work of musical exploration, taking full advantage of the opportunity afforded by cultured members and patrons, whose greatest pleasure, like that of the ancient Athenians, consists in hearing something new. Few musical institutions are, in this respect, so highly favoured. Committee, singers, and audience are all more or less amateurs in the best sense of the term, and the managers can safely present, because the public are prepared to welcome, whatever may be deemed worthy of revival or production. Many more such societies are needed throughout the land. Upon them the best interests of our art depend, and every success achieved at Cambridge is an incentive which should operate far and wide, wherever two or three are willing to act as the missionaries of music in its noblest development. At the Concert given by the University Musical Society on the 3rd ult., much was done of an interesting character, each piece in the programme being more or less a novelty. It may be that Leo's "Dixit Dominus," with which the proceedings commenced, had not been publicly heard in England for very many years, although its publication in a cheap form by Messrs. Novello and Co. might have drawn attention to the claims of a truly noble work. To the majority, therefore, who were not familiar with the music as arranged for the organ by Vincent Novello, the "Dixit Dominus" came with all the freshness of a new thing, and in their experience, we venture to say, it illustrated the eternal youth of true art. Good music never becomes old. It is we that change towards it. But neither does true appreciation greatly vary. The connoisseur who deserves to be so called is superior to the fluctuations of fashion and taste, and can welcome an old master no less heartily than a young one, nor ever think of deriding his perruque. Thus it was with Leo at Cambridge. His grand and lofty strains, so learned yet so spontaneous, made a deep impression, particularly the opening chorus—one of the most majestic utterances of sacred song that the ages have produced. Surprising, too, was the freshness of the soprano air, "Donec ponam" and the quintet "Dominus a dextris"; beautiful compositions to which time has only given an added charm. But, indeed, the whole work must have been a revelation to those who made its acquaintance for the first time, and could not fail to excite a desire for further knowledge of Leo's genius. It is to be hoped that either the Bach Society or the London Musical Society will take up the cause of these old Italian masters. Depend upon it they are worth any amount of trouble. The Cambridge performance of the Psalm was on the whole very good, the choruses being especially well given, thanks to zeal and training of no common order. After the "Dixit Dominus" came two Motetts, one by Palestrina, "Hodie Christus natus est," the other by Brahms, "Es ist das Heil." The plain massive harmonies of the father of Italian Church music were rendered with fitting sonority, and the general result of the performance, as in the case of Leo's work, was to call forth regret that so much music, equally noble, is lying neglected or forgotten. Brahms's Motett consists of a choral, first given in free five-part harmony, and then announced phrase after phrase, as a kind of plain-song by the first basses, while the other parts accompany with the same theme contrapuntally treated. All this is scholarly and interesting, but the greatest charm of the piece lies in its Coda, which may be described as simply beautiful. The work is not easy, but Mr. Villiers Stanford's choir gallantly overcame all obstacles in the way of success, and earned for themselves hearty applause. After Bach's Violin Concerto in A minor had been surprisingly well played by an amateur—the Rev. F. W. Hudson, M.A.—the Concert ended with Purcell's "Yorkshire Feast Song," as recently published under the auspices of the Purcell Society. When the new and magnificent edition of this interesting work was noticed in our columns, the music itself received attention, and we are relieved, therefore, from the task of dwelling upon its claims as representative of Purcell's genius and of the style of his day. Rather let us bear witness to the enterprise which induced its production at Cambridge, and revived an English masterpiece after, it may be, a century of neglect. All honour to the University Musical Society for such excellent service, none the less honour because, owing to the local nature of its subject, the "Yorkshire Feast Song" can never become a work of general interest. But much of Purcell remains yet to be heard, and the more often his name comes before the public the better. Again we must praise the chorus for some excellent singing; nor should the orchestra, led by Mr. Burnett, be forgotten, inasmuch as all its duties were well performed. The soloists—Miss Thorndike, Mrs. Stanford, Miss Arnim, Rev. L. Borissow, Mr. Wing, and Mr. Thorndike—all laboured zealously at their task; and the audience, as was fitting in a centre of "sweetness and light," appeared to be deeply interested by what was done. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Villiers Stanford for successfully presenting a selection so full of interest.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A CONCERT of much interest was given by this Society, at the Highbury Athenæum, on the 15th ult., the principal composition selected for performance being the late Mr. Henry Smart's short Oratorio "Jacob." Whether the lamented death of the composer has invested this work with an interest which could not be created for it during his lifetime, or whether it takes six years to convince a London public that a man has written a work worth hearing, we cannot say; but certain it is that, although "Jacob" was produced with decisive success at the Glasgow Festival of 1873, it has never been given in the metropolis until, under the skilful direction of Dr. Bridge, it was performed by the Highbury Philharmonic Society on the evening above named. After the exhaustive notice upon the Oratorio which appeared in our columns on the occasion of its first performance, it would of course be unnecessary again to state our opinion upon its merits, which we may say, on a second hearing, remains unaltered. True, there are many parts which remind us strongly of Mendelssohn, but these are rather reminiscences than plagiarisms, and the writing throughout is so charmingly natural, the instrumentation so delicately handled, and the music so sympathetic with the text, that few will be disposed to raise any minor objections to its reception as a representative work by one of our most gifted English composers. As a rule, most of the numbers which produced the greatest effect at Glasgow were equally well received at Highbury. The melodious Solo, "This is my beloved," was rendered with much dramatic feeling by Miss Jessie Jones; the true love duet between Jacob and Rachel, "Tell me, O fairest of women!" was excellently sung by Mr. Harper Kearton and Miss Jones; the Trio, "Come let us sing unto God," by the above-mentioned singers and Mr. R. Hilton, was warmly applauded; and the Quartet, "Gracious is the Lord," which included the services of Mrs. Bradshawe McKay, received every justice and was thoroughly appreciated. Dr. Bridge has brought his choir to a state of efficiency which deserves warm commendation, the execution of the choruses, "The Lord is thy keeper" (with its admirable fugal effects), "Happy art thou, O Jacob," and "Oh praise the Lord," being especially good. The tone of the choir is fairly balanced, and every attention has been paid to ensure that due observance of what is technically termed "light and shade," without which all becomes dull and wearisome. The second part of the Concert, which was miscellaneous, included Mr. C. E. Stephens's clever Overture, "A Dream of Happiness." The room was extremely well attended, and the Concert in every respect thoroughly successful.

THE Committee of Management of the Royal Academy of Music, at a meeting on Wednesday, the 10th ult., passed the following minute, in reply to a letter of H.R.H. Prince Christian, of May 28 last, inquiring whether the Royal Academy is willing to surrender its present charter and accept a new one in the form of an enclosed draft, if, on or before May 1, 1881, an annual sum of at least £3,000 can be guaranteed:—

The Committee of the Royal Academy of Music, having by virtue of their charter the exclusive and entire management of the Institution, deem that they would not fulfil their duty did they not convey to the Directors their views upon the question of the surrender of their charter, which will be brought before the meeting on the 13th inst. Considering that the Directors of the Royal Academy of Music, in view of the disastrous financial state in which the Institution was unfortunately placed in the year 1868, thought it desirable at that period to surrender the royal charter to the Queen; considering that Her Majesty returned the charter to the Directors, declaring that she was not empowered to receive it back or to annul it; considering that the Professors then engaged in teaching at the Institution, at a great personal sacrifice, undertook to carry on the Royal Academy of Music at their own risk and on their own responsibility; considering that the highly satisfactory position—both artistic and financial—which the Royal Academy of Music enjoys at present, and has enjoyed during the last ten years, is mainly due to the zeal and self-denial of the staff of Professors; the Committee of Management thought it was due to the Professors to acquaint them with the scheme of the New Musical Corporation, and to ask them to express their views on the subject. At a meeting of Professors, held at the Institution on Friday, June 6, the subject of the surrender of the present charter was fully discussed, and the following resolution was agreed to: "The Royal Academy of Music is willing to be placed on a more solid basis than that upon which it is now constituted, and to be enabled to enlarge its sphere of operation, but it cannot surrender its present charter on any conditions whatever." The Committee are advised that it is impossible to surrender the charter unless by the consent of the whole body corporate, and as there are members of the Committee and of the Board of Directors who would be unwilling to surrender the charter upon any conditions whatever, it appears to the Committee that it is simply impossible for the Directors to take any step in annihilating the present charter. The Committee would gladly see the Institution placed on a more permanent basis than that upon which it at present rests, and they venture to think that this object would be better obtained by giving to the Royal Academy of Music, without reservation, the patronage and support which are promised to the proposed College, than by erecting a new Institution.

At an extraordinary meeting of the Directors on Saturday, the 13th ult., to consider the question contained in Prince Christian's letter, the following resolution was passed:—

"That as a very large number of the members of the body politic and corporate of the Royal Academy of Music are not willing to surrender their present charter, the Directors feel compelled to decline most respectfully the proposition contained in the letter of His Royal Highness Prince Christian of May 28th last: at the same time they would gladly welcome any aid that could be given to the Royal Academy, which would enlarge the operations and advance the art of music in this country."

A CONCERT was given by the Hampstead Choral Society on the 19th ult., in the New Vestry Hall, Hampstead. The programme was not only reflective of the cultivated taste of the Conductor of the choir, Mr. Willem Coenen, but well selected to gratify the many amateurs whose growing love for good music is one of the most hopeful signs of the day. Mendelssohn's Psalm, in eight parts, "Why rage fiercely the heathen," Gade's Cantata, "Christmas Eve," and the "First Walpurgis Night," one of those truly dramatic works by which Mendelssohn proved to the world how great he might have been in Opera, were the principal compositions chosen for the display of the choir, every department of which showed the result of zealous and judicious training. Especially in the "Walpurgis Night" the good quality of the voices, as well as the perfect balance of tone, were successfully exhibited; and Mr. Coenen may fairly congratulate himself upon the result of his exertions in the past, and confidently look forward to higher results in the future. Gade's work was heard, we believe, for the first time in England; but now that its merits have been revealed, there can be little doubt that it will take its place amongst the many beautiful works of a composer who is rapidly making his way in this country. The choruses—especially that in which the seraphic and pastoral subjects are woven together—are charmingly written, and truly sympathetic with the text; and the solo which runs throughout the work—excellently sung on this occasion by Mdlle. Hélène Arnim—is extremely effective. Besides the vocalists already named, Mr. Basil E. Lawrence and Mr. Frederick King lent their assistance in the important works as well as in some solos; a graceful and well written song by Mr. Coenen, "True love," being received with warm and well deserved applause. In addition to conducting the choral portion of the programme Mr. Coenen performed the pianoforte part of Mendelssohn's well-known Trio in C minor, and, considering that he was assisted by Messrs. Wiener (violin) and Albert (violoncello), it is needless to say how perfectly this work was rendered. The pianoforte accompaniments to all the works mentioned were performed with much skill and judgment by Miss Amy Gill. In every respect the Concert gave the utmost satisfaction to a large and sympathetic audience.

CONSIDERING how much England owes to Germany for her erudite works on musical art, it becomes a pleasure to record a graceful recognition from Germany of an important contribution on the same subject from England. Mr. Ebenezer Prout's "Instrumentation Primer" has, it seems, been translated into German by Mr. Bachur; and the review upon the work in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, by no less an authority than Dr. Chrysander, deserves to be read in this country, if only as a proof that an Englishman's labours find a ready appreciation in a land which measures not its admiration for art by the boundaries of its own territory. We have not space to insert the entire notice, but quote the following portions:

The author wrote this work for a series of music primers published by Novello, Ewer and Co., and Mr. Bachur, a young, intelligent music-seller in Novello's business, translated it into German. As there is in our language a translation of the well-known work of Berlioz, and as we have besides that a large work by Lobe on Instrumentation, it will be needful to say that this little book of Mr. Prout's is not a compilation, but an entirely new and independent work, which even may be considered as a supplement to the already existing books on the subject. . . . The examples given deserve high praise for the compressed way in which they are produced. By giving the necessary information in the shortest possible way, it has been possible to give eighty-seven examples from the works of the greatest masters, from Handel to Brahms, and to find room in the 144 pages of which the little book consists to give full explanations on the subject. The examples in the book are especially praiseworthy because they represent the whole concern of the instrumentation from a much more independent standpoint than any of the examples in its predecessors. The author is a man of great knowledge, of excellent memory, and of that happy independence which permits him to choose and take the good wherever he finds it

We therefore do not hesitate to say that this little book is richer and more independent than any of its predecessors.

After minutely criticising several chapters in the book, Dr. Chrysander ends his review thus:

But Prout has widened considerably the limited horizon of his predecessors, Berlioz and Lobe, and he has written an Instruction Book which, in spite of its smallness, may be considered the best work of its kind.

We understand that the arrangements for the completion of the new National Opera-house on the Thames Embankment have been finally entered into, and that the works will now very shortly be resumed. According to the terms agreed upon, it is said the new company which has been formed undertakes to take over the uncompleted building from its original owners and representatives at the sum which has already been expended upon it, together with the ironwork and other material on the ground necessary for continuing the works, less a certain percentage for dilapidations and decrease in value caused by the long exposure of the works; and it also further agrees to reimburse to the original promoters some portion of the large amount of ground-rent which during the last few years has been paid by the lessees to the Metropolitan Board of Works, amounting to several thousand pounds. The amount which had been expended on the building when the works were stopped was upwards of £40,000, something like one-half of which was incurred in the excavations and getting in the foundations. The building has already proceeded as far as the grand tier.

At the Annual Meeting of the London Gregorian Choral Association, recently held at St. Barnabas' Schools, Pimlico, the Lord Steward (Earl Beauchamp) presided, and after the usual routine business the noble chairman, who is president of the Association, presented to Mr. R. Alderson Turner a Broadwood pianoforte, accompanied by an illuminated address and a purse of sovereigns. Mr. Turner has held the office of Hon. Sec. from the foundation of the Society in 1870, since which period over 1,800 members have been enrolled, and similar Associations formed in Colonial and American dioceses. Earl Beauchamp claimed for Mr. Turner the honour of having organised modern Gregorianists, and for the Rev. Thomas Helmore, a veteran in the cause, that of having revived the use of Gregorians in the English Church thirty years ago. Owing to overwork the Hon. Sec. has retired, and Mr. H. C. Richards has been elected to fill his place.

An excellent Amateur Concert was given, under distinguished patronage, by Miss Pattisson at her residence, 20, Clifton Gardens, Maida Hill, on the 16th ult., to aid in the maintenance of forty new beds lately opened at the University College Hospital, Gower Street. A well-selected programme was very creditably sustained by Miss Pattisson, Miss Blair, Mr. Slack, Mr. Enthoven, Mr. Frank Bertioli, Mr. Foord, and others, under the able direction of Signor Adelmann (who kindly sang during the evening solos by Bizet, Wagner, and Gounod). Miss Pattisson exhibited exceptional talent both as a vocalist and a pianist; and we sincerely hope that her philanthropic efforts may prove of substantial assistance in so worthy a cause. We are asked to state that Miss Pattisson's subscription list will remain open until the 5th inst., so as to enable all who are charitably disposed to contribute.

The Dedication Festival was held on Sunday, November 30, at St. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall Street. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Rector (the Bishop of Bedford), and in the evening by the Curate (the Rev. W. Fraser Nash, LL.B.) Both services were fully choral. At the morning service the anthems were "Now we are ambassadors" and "How lovely are the messengers" (Mendelssohn); in the evening Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great," was performed in the place of the anthem. The choir, numbering 40 voices, sang with great effect, being conducted by Mr. Faulkner Leigh, who sang the solo parts in the Cantata, assisted by Master Ward and Messrs. Dutton and Latta. Mrs. Stirling Bridge presided at the organ, and gave at the conclusion of the service "The War March of the Priests."

The Saturday evening Promenade Concerts, instituted by Mr. Charles Dubois at the Royal Aquarium, are likely to prove highly attractive if we may judge from the enormous audience assembled on the opening night, the 13th ult. We could well spare Jullien's "British Army Quadrille" from the programme; but so many good things were given, including an admirable performance of Mendelssohn's "Andante and Rondo Capriccioso" by Miss Christina Britton, and some vocal music by Madame Mary Cummings, Mrs. Weldon, and Mr. Barton M'Guckin—that this concession to what is presumed to be the "popular taste" may well be pardoned. The choral music was carefully rendered by about 200 singers, trained by Mrs. Weldon, who conducted.

The Annual Concert in aid of the funds of the Post-Office Orphan Home was given at St. James's Hall, on the 13th ult. The principal vocalists included some of the most eminent artists of the day, amongst whom may be mentioned Madame Marie Roze, Madame Liebhart, Miss Annie Sinclair, Messrs. W. H. Cummings, Wallace Wells, Henry Guy, and Frederick King. There were many—too many—encores in the vocal portion of the programme; and the instrumentalists — Messrs. Viotti Collins (violin), Oluf Svendsen (flute), and John Thomas (harp) were warmly applauded. The room was crowded in every part. Besides accompanying the vocal music, Sir Julius Benedict performed, with Mr. John Thomas, a duet for harp and pianoforte.

A Concert was given at the Tolmer's Square Institute on Tuesday, the 25th ult., by the Christ Church Choir, Westminster Road, under the direction of Mr. F. G. Edwards, Organist. The programme included several choruses and part-songs, an anthem for female voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd," and a Bridal March for the pianoforte, the two latter pieces composed by Mr. Edwards. The soloists—Miss Collins, Miss Hellis, and Mr. George Whillies—received frequent applause; and the choir, which is a voluntary one, sang throughout with much care. The hall was crowded by an appreciative audience. Mr. F. Beckley was an efficient accompanist.

At the annual social gathering of the Guilds which are enrolled in the Union some excellent music was given by members of the Church and Stage Guild, with other friends. The meeting took place in the large school-room of St. Barnabas, Ebury Street, S.W., and was largely attended by guildsmen and clergy. Mr. and Mrs. Newton Baylis (Madame Libbie Konss) lent their valuable assistance in the vocal department and were warmly received, as was also a clever amateur pianist, Mr. G. A. Horne, who rendered the March from "Tannhaüser" and an "Andante Capriccioso" of Mendelssohn with much skill.

A Concert—or rather what was termed a "full rehearsal"—of the Guildhall Orchestral Society was given on the 15th ult., before a large audience. The orchestral pieces, which included a portion of Schubert's Symphony in C, and the Overtures to "Faust" (Spohr) and "Guillaume Tell" (Rossini), were excellently rendered considering that the band is entirely composed of amateurs. Mr. Weist Hill, to whose skill and untiring exertion the Society owes its present state of efficiency, played during the evening the slow movement from one of Spohr's Violin Concertos, which elicited the warmest applause.

The South London Choral Association, under the direction of Mr. Leonard C. Venables, gave a Concert at St. James's Hall on the 5th ult. Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, and Mr. Santley were the soloists, and their efforts were much applauded. The chief feature of interest was, however, the singing of the choir, which was heard to much advantage in a selection of part-songs, glees, and choruses, well adapted to bring out the many excellent qualities of the thoroughly competent body of singers, whose intelligent and refined execution elicited hearty and well-deserved applause.

An interesting musical performance of the pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read was given on the 12th ult. at the Institution, Upper Avenue Road, Regent's Park, under the able direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, the Society's Conductor. The first part consisted of a selection from the "Messiah" (the solos in which were particularly well sung, Mozart's accompaniments being effectively represented on the organ), and the second part was miscellaneous.

THE Dedication Festival Services at St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, were held on November 20. At the choral celebration, at noon, Ouseley's Service in F was sung; and at evensong Ebdon's Evening Service, C. E. Horsley's "I was glad," and Ouseley's "It came even to pass" were efficiently rendered. On November 27 (being the octave), Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus was sung after the evening service. Miss Kate Westrop presided at the organ, and Mr. C. E. Tutill conducted.

WE understand that the Telephone is now adopted as a means of rapid communication by Mr. Alfred Hays, of the City Box Office, 4, Royal Exchange Buildings, Cornhill, his establishment being connected by this medium with a large number of the most eminent merchants' and bankers' offices in the City and with all the principal theatres; thus giving every facility for the transaction of orders. Mr. Hays already possesses telegraphic communication, and in adding telephonic has well earned the thanks of his numerous patrons.

MESSRS. BREITKOPF AND HÄRTEL, of Leipzig, the famous publishers of the complete works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Chopin, are about to add another name to this illustrious list of composers. They announce a subscription edition of the complete works of Robert Schumann, edited by Clara Schumann. Additional interest will attach to this edition from the fact that the name of Madame Schumann is connected with her late husband's works, which will now appear for the first time in a complete form.

ON Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., the Tufnell Park Amateur Choral Society gave its first Invitation Concert of the sixth season at St. George's Church Room, Holloway, N. Besides several solos and Randegger's Trio, "The Mariners," the programme included Spohr's "24th Psalm," Ferdinand Hiller's "Lurline," and Schumann's "New Year's Song." Mr. W. Henry Thomas conducted, and also played Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B flat minor. Mr. Frank Thomas was the accompanist.

WE are glad to be enabled to state that the temporary indisposition of Sir John Goss, caused we believe by the recent exceptionally severe weather, has now passed away. This good news will, we are assured, be received with the utmost pleasure not only by the musical public but by the many personal friends of the composer, the anxious inquiries of whom during his illness have amply attested the high esteem in which he is held.

AT the last weekly practice of the Bach Choir (held in the Lecture Theatre of the South Kensington Museum) the following selection of music, including solos, was announced for rehearsal: J. S. Bach's Sanctus in D, Brahms's "Requiem" (the first three numbers), Palestrina's eight-part Motett, "Hodie Christus natus est;" and the second Cantata from J. S. Bach's "Christmas Oratorio."

AN interesting Concert by the boys of Christ's Hospital was given in the Great Hall of the Institution on the 18th ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and Sir John Goss's "Hymn for Christmas Day," besides several part-songs and solos, all of which were admirably rendered by the juvenile vocalists, and loudly applauded by a highly appreciative audience.

A CONCERT was given at Steinway Hall by the pupils of Madame Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy on the 18th ult., in which much talent was exhibited in the rendering both of choral and solo music. The instrumentalists were Miss Margaret Gyde (Royal Academy of Music) and Mr. William Sutton, whose solos on the pianoforte and violin respectively elicited much applause.

THE competition for the Santley Prize of 10 guineas, "to the one who may be judged to accompany best and to transpose at sight," took place at the Royal Academy of Music, on Monday, the 15th ult. The examiners were Mr. H. C. Deacon, Mr. Sidney Naylor, and Mr. Santley, and the prize was awarded to Richard Harvey Löhr.

IN a Congregation holden at Oxford, on November 27, presided over by the Rev. Dr. Evans, Vice-Chancellor, the following were admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Music: E. J. Bellerby, New College and Selby, Yorkshire; F. Bentley, New College and Derby; G. H. Stone, New College and Torquay.

THE autograph score of Handel's Opera "Amadigi" was sold by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson on the 15th ult. for the sum of £35 10s., and that of Mozart's Quintet in D major for £45 3s. They were from the collection of the late Mr. F. Smee, of the Bank of England.

WE regret to announce the death at Maidstone, on Nov. 26, of Mr. Charles Spackman Barker, the well-known inventor of the pneumatic action as applied to organs, and also of the electric action.

MR. STEDMAN has resigned his position as Director of the Music at St. Andrew's Church, Tavistock Place.

REVIEWS.

Songs from the Published Works of Alfred Tennyson. Set to music by various composers. Edited by W. G. Cusins. [C. Kegan Paul and Co.]

THIS volume, gorgeous in scarlet and gold, ranks among the remarkable books of the season. In conception and execution it is alike worthy of its theme, and it embodies the result of a serious effort to combine the art of poetry, as represented by the graceful numbers of the Laureate, with the art of music as exemplified in strains of which these numbers need not be ashamed. It may be said that Tennyson's lyrical verses do not in every case lend themselves readily to musical treatment, and the assertion is no doubt true, owing sometimes to irregularity of construction, sometimes to peculiarities of diction. But, on the other hand, they are always instinct with the spirit of poetry, and when that is the case a true composer never fails to evolve a musical complement which, united to the words, makes up perfect expression. The songs chosen by the editor are forty-four in number, taken impartially from the entire range of Tennyson's muse, and affording examples both of his earlier and later style. Upon these no fewer than thirty-six composers have exercised their skill; the majority of them being, very properly, English by birth or adoption, while all the foreigners are to some extent or other famous men. The English musicians, actual or by courtesy, who have collaborated with Mr. Cusins are Sir J. Benedict, Sir Herbert Oakeley, Messrs. Barnett, Sullivan, Hatton, Barnby, Leslie, Jackson, Pinsuti, Goldschmidt, Hullah, Parry, Manns, G. A. Macfarren, Walter Macfarren, Hueffer, Corder, Silas, Emily J. Troup, Blumenthal, Harold Thomas, Cowen, Berger, Randegger, Tours, Florence A. Marshall, Stanford, and Cummings; while among the foreigners are Liszt, Gounod, Raff, Saint-Saëns, Scharwenka, Henschel, Joachim, and Massenet. It must be allowed that these names represent a very considerable aggregate of musical talent; and surfeited though Tennyson may be with the honours continually setting towards him from all parts of the English-speaking world, he cannot but appreciate the splendid testimonial offered by so many professors of an art kindred to his own.

We shall hardly be considered tedious, looking at the important character of the volume, if we go through its contents in order, dwelling upon each item according to its apparent value. Mr. John Francis Barnett leads the way with a setting for mezzo-soprano solo and two-part female chorus of "The Sea Fairies." This is a charming number. Mr. Barnett always writes clearly, smoothly, and melodiously, and he does so here, while reflecting to a shade the spirit of the words. The piece opens with a short solo in G minor, "Slow sailed the weary mariners"; after which, in G major, allegretto, come the bright tripping strains of the syrens, with harp accompaniment. The song nowhere presents difficulties, and is sure to be a favourite. Next Mr. Ciro Pinsuti presents "The Miller's Daughter":

> It is the miller's daughter,
> And she is grown so dear, so dear,
> That I would be the jewel
> That trembles at her ear.

This is set, allegretto moderato, in F, for a medium voice, with the accompaniment chiefly in arpeggio. The style is, with entire propriety, that of the ordinary simple English ballad, which depends for expressive effect more upon the singer than the song. Ambitious music would not in the least have suited so bucolic a theme, and this Mr. Pinsuti had, of course, discernment enough to see.

Love that hath us in the net,
Can he pass, and we forget?

The two verses beginning thus—from the same poem as the words of the song preceding—were entrusted to Mr. J. L. Hatton, who has done well with them, considering their somewhat jerky character. This is another allegretto in F major, and in simple style. But Mr. Hatton rarely composes even an unaffected song without showing the hand of a master, and several points in the present little work at once arrest attention on that account. After the author of "To Anthea" follows Mr. Robert Jackson with the well-known "Death of the Old Year"—

Full knee-deep lies the winter snow,
And the winter winds are wearily sighing.

In our opinion Mr. Jackson has by no means done justice to the pathetic beauty of his theme. His music is a plainly harmonised melody in C minor, with a chorus in C major of no special character, and made like a Psalm tune to accompany the varying expression of many verses. This lyric has yet to be set. We have next the editor himself, who comes with a part-song, grave, in F minor, to the stirring yet majestic lines, beginning—

Of old sat Freedom on the heights,
The thunders breaking at her feet:
Above her shook the starry lights:
She heard the torrents meet.

Mr. Cusins's well-developed composition may not be accused of commonplace; indeed, the first and more serious portion shows rather a determined effort to be distinctive, which in a great measure succeeds. The utterance of the music is bold and sonorous, like that of the verse, whilst an occasional ruggedness of harmony makes the association still more complete. A change to triple time (andante), and the tonic major on the words, "May perpetual youth keep dry their light from tears," affords a charming contrast, and altogether this part-song must be accounted a good thing. Mr. Cusins further undertook the setting of some rather unlyrical verses from "Audley Court"—

Oh! who would fight and march and counter-march,
Be shot for sixpence in a battle-field?

We are inclined to doubt the propriety of selecting these verses at all, but as the Editor gallantly took them himself there is not much cause for complaint, and it must be owned that his dealings with them are not unsuccessful. Nobody could have made the verses entirely acceptable as a song with music. Very different must have been the experience of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt with the delightful lines beginning—

Sleep, Ellen Aubrey, sleep and dream of me:
Sleep, Ellen, folded in thy sister's arm,
And sleeping, haply dream her arm is mine.

At any rate the result is very happy. An elegant and flowing melody in 6-8 time (G major), with a not less elegant accompaniment, gives just expression to the feeling of the text; and the entire song, though simple in construction, bears unmistakable signs of taste and skill. In "The Golden Year"—

We sleep and wake and sleep, but all things move;
The Sun flies forward to his brother Sun—

Mr. Henry Leslie affords another proof of his competence as a writer of concerted vocal music. It contains an episode in unison and harmony, "to be declaimed something like recitative, and in very free tempo," which certainly has a striking effect, and points to a new resource in the vocal treatment of freely constructed verse. But the whole composition is vigorously wrought out, and interesting. To Herr Scharwenka was allotted the verses from the story of the "Sleeping Beauty," beginning—

And on her lover's arm she leant,
And round her waist she felt it fold,
And far across the hills they went
In that new world which is the old.

The composer has set them, moderata assai, in E major, with freedom but without any extravagance of style. Athough the accompaniment is throughout elaborate and somewhat difficult, the principal melody is quite simple, and only in a passionate episodical theme in C major does Herr Scharwenka give the rein to his glowing fancy. We like the song very much, as one of the best musical illustrations of Tennyson now before the public. The next number is Mr. Arthur Sullivan's "St. Agnes' Eve"—a song already well known, and upon which, therefore, it is now needless to dilate. Mr. Sullivan is also the composer of the number following, in which the bucolic love-story of "Edward Gray"—

Sweet Emma Moreland of yonder town,
Met me walking on yonder way—

receives sympathetic and appropriate treatment. The composer knows well how to be expressive, and at the same time perfectly natural and unaffected. He is so here. "Edward Gray" is a simple ditty—a true ballad, but it does not contain an unmeaning or matter-of-course phrase, and if it were published in a separate form, popularity would doubtless be its fate. Sir Julius Benedict's "Farewell"—

Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea,
Thy tribute wave deliver:
No more by thee my steps shall be,
For ever and for ever—belongs to the most masterly things in the volume; the melody in E flat, 6-4, having well-marked characteristics, while both the "figures" and the harmonies of the accompaniment are distinguished by freedom and boldness. The verses from the story of King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid follow—

Her arms across her breast she laid;
She was more fair than words can say—and these have fallen into the congenial hands of Mr. Joseph Barnby, by whom they have been set very gracefully. Equally meritorious of its kind is Mr. John Hullah's music to "Come not when I am dead." Indeed our English composers appear in most of these little works to singular advantage, as though association with the greatest living English poet put them on their mettle.

Next month we shall complete our notice of this beautiful and attractive volume, which, there can be little doubt, will pass from many a hand to many another hand as a seasonable token of Christmas remembrance.

Original Compositions for the Pianoforte. By Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE publishers of this handsome folio, and of its companion in octavo, issued some time since a complete edition of Mendelssohn's pianoforte works in four volumes, which, no doubt, will ever remain a favourite copy with amateurs. But it was desirable, in the interest of economy, to produce if possible the same works in one book, and this task has been very successfully accomplished. Looking at the mass of matter to be dealt with, the most obvious difficulty lay in compressing it into a handy volume. By dint, however, of a careful selection of paper combining lightness with quality, the obstacle has been overcome, and every bar of Mendelssohn's published music for the household instrument is now brought within one cover. The edition will be a boon to amateurs generally on this account, but it is otherwise acceptable as a beautiful specimen of music engraving and printing. The eye rests on each page with pleasure, not merely because of the legibility of the text, but also because every character is perfectly formed and the whole tastefully displayed. It may be worth while to add, lest the point escape attention, that the edition contains both the Concertos (with their orchestral passages compressed into pianoforte score) and the entire eight books of the "Lieder ohne Worte."

Watchfulness: The Parable of the Ten Virgins. A Cantata for Treble and Contralto Voices. The words compiled from the Holy Scriptures by W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac. The music by Henry Hiles, Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Forsyth Brothers.]

PENDING the composition of a new Oratorio, sacred Cantatas are springing up with a rapidity which convinces us that we have writers in our midst fully capable of supporting the dignity of musical art in this country, and that they only await that encouragement so freely awarded to the composers of other nations to take their true place in the world of art. Dr. Hiles's latest contribution to our fast-increasing stock of such pieces is unpretentious in character, but so well written throughout as to ensure its acceptance with musical as well as unmusical hearers. After a brief instrumental introduction, the Cantata opens with a soprano solo, followed by a chorus. This solo, commencing on the final crotchet of the bar, which is bound to the first crotchet of the next bar, is agreeable enough musically; but the syncopation compels such a false accent to the words that we cannot reconcile ourselves to the phrase. A short soprano recitative precedes an important chorus, which contains two movements contrasted in character, and includes some well considered and effective points. The Scena for contralto, "While the Bridegroom tarried," is vocal and full of interest; but the solo with chorus which follows is somewhat laboured, and scarcely tones with the rest of the Cantata. The Trio, "They that be wise shall shine as the firmament," is an exceedingly graceful and melodious specimen of part-writing, and may probably make its way out of the work for which it was written. After a recitative the graceful chorus "The Virgins that be her fellows shall bear her company" follows with much effect. Perhaps the best-written piece in the work is the succeeding chorus in A minor, "Lord, Lord, open to us," the choral response to which, in F major, "Not every one that saith to me 'Lord! Lord!'" is exceedingly dramatic and in true sympathy with the words, some good imitative passages occuring towards the latter portion of the chorus. The Cantata ends with a repetition of the opening phrase, slightly altered, in chorus. There is no monotony in key nor in style throughout this work, but there is a monotony in rhythm which we cannot but think must be felt in performance; for—with the exception of the brief chorus in A minor, and the equally brief Trio—every piece is in 4-4 time. We perceive that the Cantata is scored for the orchestra; and should be glad to hear it with that instrumental colouring which no doubt carries out the composer's original intention, for in parts the pianoforte accompaniment sounds thin. No work written for an orchestra can be fairly judged by a pianoforte reduction of the score; and every writer, therefore, who instruments his composition should, as Dr. Hiles does, state the fact upon his title-page. As the work is by no means difficult of execution, we especially commend it to the attention of the many metropolitan and provincial choirs in search of novelty. A Cantata of moderate length, and demanding no exceptional solo or choral power, should be a boon to concert-givers who are desirous of performing entire works, and yet not ambitious enough to battle with the intricacies of full Oratorios.

Christmas Album. Twenty-four Pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by P. Tschaikowsky. [Neumeyer and Co.]

WORKS especially dedicated to the festive season of the year must not be kept waiting for a notice; and although the Album now before us comes too late to be recommended as a Christmas present, we may urge it upon the attention of parents and guardians as a most appropriate New Year's Gift. No doubt Schumann has set the fashion of writing quaint little pianoforte pieces with equally quaint titles; and perhaps in the present day this fashion—like most others—is almost worn to death; but when we get fanciful sketches as good as we find scattered throughout this volume they may be certain of a cordial welcome. We say "scattered throughout" the book, because all are not equally entitled to praise; but amongst the two dozen pieces none are bad, and many are really excellent. Of course it is difficult, indeed impossible, to realise musically such titles as "The young Lord," "Mamma," "The New Doll," or "Grandmother's Story"; but this objection may be urged as much against Schumann's "Kinderscenen" as against the "Christmas Album"; and we cannot afford to ignore good music, even of such simple construction. Our especial favourites in this collection are the "March of the Toy Soldiers," "Dolly is ill" (an appropriately pathetic piece in G minor, in which the moanings of the much loved invalid are admirably suggested), "Happy Dream" (a really charming "song without words"), "The Swallow's chirping," and "The Hurdy-Gurdy." All those we have mentioned are of course peculiarly fitted for illustration; but there are very many not lending themselves as well to musical treatment, which may be equally acceptable to the young performer.

The Child's Book of Praise. A Manual of Devotion, in Simple Verse, by C. F. Hernaman. With accompanying Tunes, edited by C. A. Barry. [J. T. Hayes, Joseph Masters and Co., and Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"ONE of the last undertakings of the late lamented Dr. J. B. Dykes," says the editor of this work, in his preface, "was that of preparing a musical edition of 'The Child's Book of Praise,' by C. F. Hernaman, the text of which, with a preface by the Rev. Jas. Skinner, had already been published in 1873." Unfortunately the death of Dr. Dykes happened when he had completed but five tunes for the book, and received one or two others from friends; but his plan of soliciting musical contributions from others to add to his own compositions was carried on by Mr. Barry, and the result is a work which reflects the utmost credit upon those who have so zealously laboured in the cause. The five tunes by Dr. Dykes are not only excellent, musically speaking, but deeply sympathetic with the words to which they are allied, No. 8, "Easter," especially being noticeable for its simple eloquence and appropriateness to the season for which it is written. The other contributors are Dr. G. B. Arnold, W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Henry Gadsby, Dr. E. G. Monk, Professor Sir Herbert Oakeley, Mus. Doc., Rev. A. B. Orr, Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, C. Hubert H. Parry, Ebenezer Prout, Dr. Stainer, C. E. Stephens, Professor Sir R. P. Stewart, Mus. Doc., C. Villiers Stanford, and the editor, who although having furnished a large number—indeed the largest number—of tunes, has modestly reserved the smaller hymns for himself. It would be invidious where all are so good to select any particular compositions for praise; but we may say generally that the many eminent artists who have assisted in the work have worthily sustained their reputation; and that either in children's services, at school or in the home circle, this little Manual of Devotion will be found most valuable.

The Girl to her Bird. Words by Hamilton Aidè. Music by A. G. Thomas. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MR. THOMAS is a stranger to us; but his song is the work of an artist. We are always frightened of vocal pieces in which any reference is made to a bird; for what may be described as the conventional "twiddle" on the pianoforte is almost certain to occur whenever an opportunity offers, and very often when it does not. The composer of this artless little ballad has, however, very properly given a musical setting rather to the feeling than to the words of the poetry; and the result is a charming little duet for voice and pianoforte, which we cordially commend to the attention of vocalists in search of novelty. We are particularly pleased with the treatment of the phrase "O let me fly," the long-held G for the voice, on the dominant harmony of C, dropping through the seventh to the key-note, expressing the words most sympathetically. Mr. Thomas might, we think, with tolerable certainty, calculate upon an equal amount of success in some more important work.

A Swing-Song, for the Pianoforte. By Eugene Woycke. [Paterson and Son.]

SWING-SONGS, like all pieces in which the rhythmic character so materially assists the composer in his work, are multiplying fast. Marches, Gavottes, Mazurkas, Bourrées, &c., flood the market; and their authors, therefore, must not be surprised if we begin to judge such compositions not so much by their adherence to the orthodox type as to their abstract musical merits. Whether, then, we can obtain the "swinging" effect in the piece before us by obeying the composer's direction to mark every half-bar powerfully is scarcely so important a consideration as whether he has written a good composition; and, viewing it in this light, we cannot accord it any very high praise. The subject is not particularly striking, and the enharmonic change after the second double bar seems somewhat forced. Nevertheless, we think the piece would please, especially if its title be proclaimed, before performance, to all the listeners.

The Psalmist. A Collection of Tunes, Chants, and Anthems for Public Worship, and for Domestic and Family Use. [Haddon and Co., and Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS book appeared many years ago in a less compendious form. We have from time to time noticed in these columns the different parts as they reappeared in their enlarged form, so that we have only to state that the work is now complete in one volume, and will be found to contain a large variety of music for every portion of the service which is usually rendered chorally.

We venture to remind our readers that the book is intended for Nonconformists, and contains 627 tunes, selected chiefly from the best hymn-books of the day; and also two sets of chants to the whole of the Psalter and other portions of Scripture; several settings of the Te Deum, Benedicite, Responses to the Commandments, &c., as well as what is generally known as Tallis's Service. There are also upwards of 100 anthems, chiefly of a congregational character. The book is under the editorial superintendence of Mr. Ebenezer Prout.

The Literature of National Music. By Carl Engel. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE interesting papers upon National Music—republished from "THE MUSICAL TIMES"—will, we doubt not, form a standard work for reference upon the subject; for, as Mr. Engel says in his preface, most of the publications where accurate information is to be found are out of print, and there is no probability, except in some rare instances, of their being reprinted. The author of these articles has collected them into a neat little book, and offers them to the librarian, as well as the musician, in the confident hope that by drawing attention to the most important works on National Music, he will save the student much trouble and inconvenience. We sincerely hope that the labour of so earnest an historian will be fully appreciated by the musical public.

The Professional Pocket-book; or, Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1880. Published under the immediate direction of Sir Julius Benedict. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

LITTLE can be said upon an annual like the "Professional Pocket-book," for the announcement of its appearance, with the conventional commendation of its usefulness, must really meet all the wishes of the publishers. It may be mentioned, however, that the space usually allotted to the record of "Quarterly Engagements," and the registry of "Literary and Musical Works" at the beginning, and to "Receipts and Expenditure" at the end, is in the issue of this year not provided for. This makes the book look, of course, much thinner; but we really do not see that in a "pocket-book" such entries would often be made by professors.

A Festival Setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, for voices in unison, with accompaniment for Organ. By G. F. Huntley. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. HUNTLEY has in this instance written excellent music for the Canticles, but we are sorry the setting is not arranged for four parts, instead of for voices in unison. It would then probably be heard in some cathedrals where nineteenth century music is not altogether ignored. The vocal part is of very moderate compass—almost within the limit of the octave—but the organ accompaniment is of a much more elaborate character.

The Potter. Part-song. The poetry by Longfellow. Music composed by Alfred R. Gaul. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A HAPPY setting of some words which seem written for musical treatment. The song is full of character, the monotony of verses 1, 2, and 3 being excellently contrasted by the fourth verse, where the theme is placed in the minor. The gradual stopping of the wheel is managed with much skill at the conclusion, the voices dying off on the opening phrase with good effect. The composition thoroughly deserves all the popularity it is certain to obtain.

Sing, O Heavens. Anthem by George Wilks. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS anthem consists of three movements, and in many ways is highly commendable. A certain want of experience is here and there visible, but the general melodiousness of the music tempts one to overlook these slight failings. We think the last movement is not, from any point of view, equal to the first two, but as a whole the work is successful and interesting.

The Angel's Whisper. Part-song. Composed specially for and dedicated to the Members of the Blackheath Choral Society. By J. T. Field. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE words of this song—already so successfully set as a solo—are well suited for a part-song; and Mr. Field has judiciously wedded them to a placid and sympathetic melody, instead of displaying his knowledge by contrapuntal effects, out of keeping with the subject. The modulations are natural and not too numerous, and the part-writing is extremely good throughout.

Christmas Hymns and Carols. By Edwin Lemare. [Weekes and Co.]

THE general character of the music to these hymns is tuneful and tasteful, but we are inclined to think that the parts, in some cases, are too high for any but good choirs. We have not sufficient space to notice them singly, but we must be allowed to give a word of praise to the expressive music written to the "Lullaby."

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F major. By T. Musgrave. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer has not attempted anything out of the common order, but he has written very well, in an unpretentious manner. The music throughout is melodious, and will be popular with choristers wherever it is performed.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE projected first performance of Herr Wagner's music-drama "Parsifal" having been indefinitely postponed, the aims of the Society of Patrons of the Bayreuth undertaking are now directed towards the foundation there of a central national school for the fostering of a purely national style in symphonic and musico-dramatic works, and the establishment and carrying on of a living tradition within the limits of the proposed institution. In furtherance of this project the Society has recently published a pamphlet calling upon the numerous admirers of the poet-composer to aid in subscribing the necessary capital, so that in May, 1883, the latter's seventieth birthday may be celebrated, together with the realisation of the scheme in hand. However much the existence of any "purely national" art, as regards music, may be questioned, there can be no doubt that an institution like the one contemplated would be unique in its way, and might bestow a benefit upon the art by concentrating the efforts of native genius. To the number of German towns where the Nibelungen Tetralogy has been performed in its entirety Brunswick may now be added, where the gigantic work has recently been mounted at the Hof-Theater under the direction of Capellmeister Abt.

Eduard Lassen, at present conductor of the orchestra at Weimar, has, it is stated, been offered a similar post at the Royal Opera at Hanover, in the room of Dr. Hans von Bülow, but has declined to accept it.

It is rumoured that Herr Max Bruch has resigned the post of conductor of the Stern'sche Gesangverein at Berlin, which he has held but for a short time, and that Herr Julius Stockhausen, its former director, will again assume that position.

Herr Rubinstein's Opera "Nero" continues to be the chief attraction at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater. The new work is in course of preparation also at the Imperial Opera of Vienna.

We read in the Leipzig Signale that the preparations for the performance during this summer of the "Passion Play" at Oberammergau are being actively carried on, a new theatre having been erected for the purpose capable of holding some five or six thousand spectators.

Max Bruch's Cantata "The Lay of the Bell" has recently been performed at Magdeburg and at Breslau, meeting on each occasion with great success.

At one of the recent subscription Concerts of the Munich Musical Academy, the newly engaged harpist, Mr. Lockwood, created a highly favourable impression, the purity and precision of his tone and the clearness of his phrasing being especially commented on.

The second part of Goethe's "Faust," with Pierson's music, is shortly to be produced both at Königsberg and at Dresden, the fact being the more interesting considering the enormous difficulties which the mounting of the work presents.

Herren Reinecke and Schradiek are just now engaged upon a concert-tour in Germany having for its special object the performance on two successive evenings of the whole of Beethoven's violin sonatas, to the number of ten. The undertaking creates much interest in musical circles.

Hans Richter, the capellmeister par excellence, whose contract with the Viennese Opera terminates in May next, has, it is stated, entered upon a fresh engagement for ten years as orchestral director at that institution.

Mdlle. Marie Wieck, the eminent pianiste, sister of Madame Schumann, has made a most successful concert-tour in Sweden and Norway, in association with Paul Viardot, the gifted violinist.

There has been no novelty produced at the Paris Grand-Opéra during last month, but several more or less successful débuts have taken place of the newly engaged company, among which may be mentioned that of M. Maurel in "Don Giovanni," the tenor Dereims in "Faust," the tenor Mierzwinski as Vasco in "L'Africaine." In the last-named opera Mdlle. Krauss continues to charm the audience in the rôle of Selika, and Mdlle. Heilbron in that of Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." Meyerbeer's opera "L'Etoile du Nord" has been remounted at the Opéra-Comique. The severe temperature ruling in Paris has, however, greatly interfered with the daily receipts of the theatres of the French capital, some of which were obliged to suspend their performances for several days together.

M. Vaucorbeil, the present director of the Paris Grand-Opéra, has increased his popularity with the personnel of that establishment by proposing to the Ministry of Fine Arts to add the sum of 100,000 francs to the salaries of the members of the orchestra, the chorus, and the ballet. Thus for instance, the salaries of the orchestra, which hitherto absorbed 30,000 francs, is to be increased to 50,000 francs, the augmentation of pay being apportioned according to priority of service and individual merit.

M. Massenet, who has just completed a five-act opera entitled "Hérodiade," is now engaged upon the composition of a lyrical work bearing the title of "Werther," the libretto being founded on Goethe's well-known sentimental novel.

Le Ménestrel reproduces an article recently published in the journal Le Français from the pen of M. Adolphe Jullien, directed against the disparaging criticism regarding the compositions of Robert Schumann, contained in a late number of Herr Wagner's organ, the Bayreuther Blätter, and presumably dictated by the poet-composer himself.

An opera in four acts entitled "Preciosa," the first lyrical stage-work of the young maestro Smareglia, was recently performed with success at the Teatro Dal Verme of Milan.

Our Turin correspondent writes that the musical season there is beginning to show signs of activity. At the Teatro Vittorio Emmanuele, Signore Anna Renzi and Mariannina Lodi have made successful appearances. The first Concerto Populare of the thirty-fifth season took place on November 23 last, including a performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture. Our correspondent adds: "It may be interesting to the many English admirers of Thalberg to know that on All Souls' Day the pavement of the beautiful little chapel which contains his monument, in the Campo Santo at Naples, had been converted into a rich carpet of flowers, arranged in geometrical designs."

According to the journal Il Trovatore no less than six hundred and twenty-five new operas have appeared in Italy during the years 1858 to 1879, giving an average of thirty for each year.

The prospectus for the present season of opera at the Teatro Bellini of Naples mentions among the singers engaged, Mesdames Galli-Marie, Musiani, Trebbi, Barbieri, Rossi; the tenors, Gnone, Deliliers; the baritones, Barbieri, Souvestre, Morelli; and the basses, Lombardelli and Sebastiani. Among the operas to be produced at that institution for the first time are named Bizet's "Carmen," Weber's "Freischütz," Usiglio's "Le Donne curiose," and D'Arienzo's "La Figlia del Diavolo."

The Gazetta Musicale di Milano records the great success of Ponchielli's opera, "Gioconda," which was performed at Genoa for the first time there on November 27 last, and has since met with frequent repetitions. The composer was called before the curtain no less than thirty-five times. The performance itself is spoken of as having been highly satisfactory.

Advices from Madrid speak of the extraordinary enthusiasm created by the appearance of Madame Nilsson, as well as of the tenor, M. Gayarré, in the operatic representations held at the Spanish capital in connection with the royal marriage festivities.

Madame Albani, after achieving a series of triumphs at the Theatre Pagliano at Florence, has gone to Geneva, where she is fulfilling a short operatic engagement. The eminent vocalist will continue her artistic journey in Holland and Belgium.

The Belgian Government has appointed a Commission composed of a number of eminent musicians and literary men, for the purpose of superintending the publication of the works of the old Belgian composers. The collection is to be inaugurated with the works of Grétry, comprising not only his musical but also his literary writings, and contributions are solicited on the part of possessors of autograph letters and other manuscripts from the pen of that remarkable composer—an appeal which will, no doubt, be readily responded to.

We record the death, at the age of sixty-five, of Louis-Desiré Besozzi, a musician of merit who had gained the Grand Prix de Rome when a pupil of the Conservatoire in 1837, and whose life had been devoted to the organisation, in the French capital, of choral societies, for whom he wrote numerous compositions.

The death is also announced of Adolf Klauwell, the composer of a number of vocal and pianoforte Etudes, and much esteemed as a professor of the art. He died at Leipzig at the age of sixty-nine.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of Concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have not before acknowledged the letters of Mr. Harding or Mr. Ward on the Chord of 6-4-3, thinking it probable that some other of your readers might have remarks to offer on the subject. As, however, it seems now to rest with the above-named gentlemen, I would, in thanking them for their communications, add a few words to conclude my share of the discussion.

I. The Age of the Chord (Mr. Harding's letter, vol. xx., p. 492). I am not concerned to defend Mr. Havergal's precise words: he was not an exact writer. But when, in 1844, he described the Chord as "hardly a century old," it was only in passing, the gist of his observation being that it was not recognised by our earlier Church composers. This position is scarcely invalidated by the discovery of the Chord in a German treatise some twenty years earlier. A specimen from the writings of Dr. Blow, Dr. Croft, or Jer. Clark would have been more to the purpose. I must still think, therefore, that the insertion of the Chord in Dr. Turner's Chant, published in 1674, must be condemned as an anachronism.

II. Handel's avoidance or use of the Chord (Mr. Ward's letter, vol. xx., p. 545). It will strike most persons as rather singular that authors like Dr. Callcott and Dr. Crotch should assert that Handel "uniformly omitted the fourth," and "avoided it as much as possible" in this combination, if it is to be found in such well-known works as "Solomon" and "Israel in Egypt." Indeed, Mr. Harding avows his belief that "Handel never used it." There must surely be some misconception. But we may turn to Mr. Ward's illustrations.

1. "With pious heart," measure 9.—Here is D forming a fourth to the bass. But it is not struck at the beginning of the chord; it occurs at the end of the measure as it moves into its resting-place in the final harmony. No question but fourths of transition and anticipation are to be met with in the scores of the old masters.

2. The "Hailstone" Chorus, ante-penultimate measure of voice parts.—Here G is held on throughout, and so forms a fourth on the bass, unaccented note, as it passes from C to E. The thorough-bass gives the figure 6 solus, showing that the fourth did not enter into Handel's calculation.

And thus, by the way, we see the value of the good old plan of figuring the bass; it revealed the harmony in the mind of the composer, whatever might be the disposition of the parts.

It will be remembered that Dr. Crotch arranged Handel's Choruses for the piano, and was celebrated for his own performance of this one. Would he have ignored this passage had he considered it a case in point?

3. So in the final chorus, at the words "He thrown into the sea," G is continued through the whole measure. It only forms a momentary fourth on a transient bass, in a cluster of notes.

These can hardly be admitted as "positive instances" of the harmony; and when it is recollected how continually evident pains were taken by the "Giant" to exclude the fourth in his use of Re, Mr. Havergal was justified in styling it "the non-Handelian chord of 6-4-3."

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

HENRY PARR.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I should like to call attention, in the columns of the leading musical paper, to the results of two years' trial of the reformed scheme of examination for degrees in music at Cambridge. I believe the facts are that last year nineteen candidates entered for the first stage of the examination, ten of whom passed it. Only three of these had their exercises accepted, and only one of them succeeded in passing the final examination. This year seventy-four candidates entered the first examination, thirty-nine of whom passed it. Probably the whole of these thirty-nine did not send up exercises, but as there were seven of last year's men in addition eligible to send in new exercises, the number received probably did not fall far short of thirty-nine. Only seven exercises were approved, one of which was by a last year's man, so that only six of the exercises of 1879 were passed. Lastly, the degree was obtained by six men, three of whom had been plucked in different stages last year. So that, speaking briefly, in 1878 nineteen men started, of whom one finished, and in 1879 seventy-four men started, of whom three finished. It must be borne in mind that these men are, as I believe, almost without an exception, over thirty years of age, having availed themselves of the liberty allowed to such candidates during this year and last. They have nearly all been in the profession for years, and are possessed of the judgment and knowledge that teaching brings.

I venture to say that such wholesale plucking of candidates, already selected by age for examination, is unknown in the annals of any university or educational institution. Standards of examination are human, and everyone can see that the Cambridge examiners have set up a standard which is wholly impracticable.

In other subjects at the university a pass degree is always within the compass of a man who works industriously. It is a disgrace to leave the university without a degree. A year's delay at the utmost will ensure success. Yet here we have six of the ten men who passed the first stage last year still without their degrees.

The conclusion to me is obvious. The examiners have wholly ignored what may be called the pass stage, and have approved those only in each stage who would be said in other examinations to pass in honours or first class.

In calling attention to this matter I have no disappointed interests to serve. I have merely looked up the facts from the published lists, and my motive is to call attention to what I regard as a serious miscarriage of justice.

I am, Sir, truly yours,

December, 1879. MUS. BAC.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR PRIZE COMPOSITIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Can you or any of your readers inform me whether the two prizes offered by the London Sunday School Choir for an Anthem and a Part-song (vide "THE MUSICAL TIMES" for July), have yet been awarded? I have searched your columns in vain for the notification which was promised when the award should have been made; and, probably, many others who sent in compositions would be glad of the information.

Your obedient servant,

SEPTUOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANFF.—The first Concert of the Banff Musical Association for the present season, under the direction of Herr J. Hoffmann, was given at the County Hall on the 5th ult. The programme included the Stabat Mater of Rossini (to English words by W. Ball), the soloists being Mrs. Barclay, Miss Isa Dickson, Messrs. Alex. Simpson, and A. Mitchell; Sir Michael Costa's Serenata, The Dream, Misses Lisa Ker and Isa Dickson, Messrs. Walker and Baird being the principal singers, and a very good instrumental selection, in which Herr Hoffmann successfully displayed his talents both as pianist and violinist. The accompanists were, at the pianoforte, Miss J. Simpson and Mrs. Gordon; and at the harmonium, Miss K. Martin.

BEVERLEY.—The members of the Musical Society gave their eleventh Concert on the 16th ult., in the Norwood Rooms, when Smart's Bride of Dunkerron formed the first part of the programme, the second being miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Miss M. Court, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. A. McCall. Mr. John Camidge conducted.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company ended their second visit, for six nights, on November 30. Mignon was performed twice, and on the 27th Goetz's Taming of the Shrew was given for the first time in Birmingham, and was well received. The other performances were repetitions of familiar works.——Mr. Stratton's Second Popular Chamber Concert took place in the Masonic Hall on November 25. The programme comprised works by Beethoven, Raff, Sterndale Bennett, &c., all played with excellent effect. The attendance was greater than at the opening Concert. At these Concerts encores are abolished, and no one allowed to enter or leave the room during actual performance, arrangements which meet with the entire approval of the subscribers.——Handel's Messiah was given in the Church of the Saviour on the 4th ult., by the members of the singing-classes connected with the Church. The solos were taken by Miss Fraser Brunner, Mrs. Forrest Currie, Messrs. Banks, Roper, and W. Pearson; the choruses were generally very well executed. There was a small band led by Mr. Synyer; Mr. Stratton presided at the organ, and Mr. Stevenson conducted. There was a very large attendance.——The second of Messrs. Harrison's Popular Subscription Concerts took place in the Town Hall on the 10th ult., Mr. C. Hallé's band being the great attraction. The programme was made up from Beethoven, Rossini, Svendsen, Leo Délibes, &c. Madame Néruda played a Concerto by Vieuxtemps, and pieces by Nardini and Paganini; Mr. Hallé gave a Nocturne (Op. 37, No. 2), and Valse (Op. 34, No. 3), by Chopin, and, with orchestra, the Gavotte and Musette from Raff's Suite for orchestra and pianoforte. The vocalists were Mdlle. Minnie Hauk (her first appearance in Birmingham), Mr. Maas, and Mr. Frederick King. Their selections met with great success, and there were several encores. A large audience was present.——The Cheap Concerts for the People still meet with great success, the Town Hall being crowded every Saturday evening. On November 30 there was an Orchestral Concert given by the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union, conducted by Mr. C. J. Duchemin. The vocalist was Miss Maude Kelly, who sings with taste and finish, and was encored several times. Two instrumental items also met with that compliment. On the 13th ult. Mr. A. J. Sutton's Choir occupied the platform, and performed Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus; and on the 20th the Handsworth Philharmonic Society gave Macfarren's May Day and some Christmas Carols.

BRADFORD.—The members of the Manningham Vocal Union gave a Complimentary Concert to their Conductor, Mr. F. C. Atkinson, at the Church Institute, on November 25. The programme was well calculated to display the exceptionally good training of the choir, the part-songs especially being most effectively rendered. Schumann's Gipsy Life was also included in the selection, and was done ample justice to. The solo vocalists were the Misses Misdale, Mrs. Ter Meer, Miss Sweeny, Miss Milligan, Messrs. J. Pollard, F. C. Atkinson, Emsley, and R. Richardson, Mr. T. Akeroyd (a pupil of Mr. Atkinson), contributing two solos on the pianoforte with much success. The Concert was extremely well attended.——On Wednesday morning, the 3rd ult., the Bishop of Ripon consecrated Christ Church, Bradford, which has been erected at a cost of £12,000, towards which £10,000 has been received from the Corporation for the site of the old church for improvements. There was a large congregation. The organ, which is the gift of Mr. William Waud, has cost about £600, and has been built and erected by Messrs. James Conacher and Sons, of Alfred Street, Princess Street, Huddersfield, from a specification drawn up by Mr. Jeremiah Rhodes (Organist of Carlisle Road Wesleyan Chapel, Manningham), who presided at the instrument throughout the service The instrument is admitted by those who heard it to be very fine, and equal to any in Bradford. The reeds are of particularly good quality, and free from harshness. The organ, which was thoroughly well played by Mr. Rhodes, both in the voluntaries and the service, gave perfect satisfaction to that gentleman and all connected with the church.——Mr. S. Midgley gave the first of two Concerts of Chamber Music in the Church Institute on Friday evening, the 5th ult., when he was assisted by Herr Straus and Herr Daubert. The most interesting item in the programme was Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97, which was well rendered. Among the various solos Herr Straus created the greatest impression. Herr Daubert played a Sarabande and Gavotte by Popper with fine expression and pure tone. Mr. Midgley, in addition to his other arduous labours, contributed three pianoforte solos.

BRIGG, LINCOLNSHIRE.—The Fourth Concert of the Brigg Choral Society was given in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday, November 25, when selections from the Messiah and Samson were rendered by an amateur band and chorus of eighty performers. The room was crowded, and the Concert a great success. Madame Evison, of Hull, Mr. Hayes, of Boston, and Mr. Dodds, of Leeds, were the soloists. Mr. C. W. Cray conducted, and Miss F. Smith accompanied.

BRIGHTON.—The fourth and last of Mr. Kuhe's Subscription Concerts for this season took place on Monday evening, the 1st ult., in the Pavilion. The entertainment was most successful. Mr. Sims Reeves was unable to appear, and his place was taken by Mr. Barton M'Guckin, a very efficient substitute. The other vocalists were Mesdames Sterling and Trebelli, Miss Robertson, Miss Fanny Robertson, and Mr. Santley. Madame Térèse Liebe, was the violinist. Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir, under the direction of Mr. King, contributed some welcome part-songs. —— The Sacred Harmonic Society gave the last Concert of the thirty-fourth season on the 9th ult., when J. F. Barnett's Ancient Mariner, and a selection of part-songs, ballads, &c., were performed. The soloists were Miss Marianne Jones, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Harper Kearton (who appeared as a substitute for Mr. F. Boyle), and Mr. F. Ward. The Cantata was excellently rendered, and both soloists and choir were much applauded. Two part-songs were also sung by the chorus, one of which, "The Convert," was written expressly for this Concert by Mr. R. Taylor. The music is admirably adapted to the words, and the piece, capitally sung, was enthusiastically encored. Miss Annie Spearing and Miss Spearing were the accompanists, and Mr. R. Taylor conducted.

DURHAM.—The Third Evening Concert of the Philharmonic Society (for the benefit of the Durham County Hospital) was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., when Haydn's Oratorio, The Creation, was performed. The principal singers were Miss Tomlinson, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Grice. Miss Tomlinson was loudly applauded throughout the evening, especially for her rendering of "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens." Mr. Binns and Mr. Grice sang with fine effect the recitatives and airs with which the Oratorio abounds. The choruses were extremely well rendered, and the band, with Mr. J. Wood as leader, played remarkably well. Great credit is due to Mr. D. Whitehead, the Conductor, for bringing the Society to such perfection in so short a time.

EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital on the 4th ult., in the Music Class-room, to a numerous audience, including a large number of students. The opening piece, by Corelli, a composer to whom it is said that Handel was greatly indebted, was played chiefly on the diapasons. Handel's air "Verdi prati," which was sung at the last Reid Festival, was next given, and introduced the softest stops on the swell organ; and in the chorus which followed, both wood and metal "32's" on the pedal organ were used with great effect. The original scoring (four horns and strings) of Beethoven's Sestet was closely imitated, and amongst other interesting items Kowalski's Menuetto and Trio, written in the old style, was very successfully rendered. A Gavotte is always a favourite movement in the Music Class-room, and Bach's No. 2 was irresistibly redemanded, and partly repeated. The combination of stops, embracing orchestral oboe, clarionet, and cor anglais, was especially noticeable in this number.——A second Recital by Professor Oakeley took place in the Music Class-room on the 18th ult., when an interesting programme was gone through. The vocalist was Miss Wakefield, who gave four songs in a very effective manner.

FROME.—A very successful Concert was given at the Mechanics' Hall on the 16th ult. by Mr. W. H. Cox, who was assisted by Miss Laura Cox (grand piano), Mr. W. G. Cox (violin), Mr. Andrew Waite (violoncello), and the following amateur vocalists: Miss Archard (soprano) and Mr. E. R. Trotman (baritone). The programme, which consisted principally of classical music, was thoroughly enjoyed by a select and fashionable audience.

GEORGE TOWN, DEMERARA, WEST INDIES.—Mr. J. W. Potter, Organist of St. Andrew's, gave an Organ Recital on October 28, at that Church, to an audience of over 1,000 people. The programme was highly interesting and the several pieces gave much satisfaction to the listeners.

GRAVESEND.—The Annual Concert in aid of the funds of Her Majesty's Customs' Orphanage was given on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. H. Phillips, the Assembly Rooms being filled with a most appreciative audience. The artists engaged were Miss Josephine Pulham, R.A.M., Miss Martha Harries, Madame Edwyn Frith, Miss Annie L. Turner, Messrs. C. Rowcliffe, Arthur Thomas, Edwyn Frith, and H. P. Matthews; Miss Turner and Miss Clare Matthews solo pianists, and Mr. W. Miller accompanist. The programme was well selected, and, on the whole, rendered with much effect.

HEMEL HEMPSTEAD, HERTS.—The Annual Concert of Mr. Parsons, Organist of the Parish Church, was given in the Town Hall on the 2nd ult. Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Belval, Messrs. Langton, Fletcher, and C. J. Bishenden were the principal vocalists. The Concert was highly patronised and most successful. Mr. Parsons and his sons played various pieces with considerable skill.

KINGSBRIDGE.—Haydn's Oratorio, The Creation, was given on Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., at the Town Hall, by the members of the Vocal Association, assisted by Miss Marian Williams, Mr. Bywater, and Mr. Farley Sinkins. The choral singing was, as usual, especially good. The accompaniments were played by Mrs. Squire and Miss Annie Pitts at the pianoforte (four hands), and Mr. Craddock rendered valuable assistance at the harmonium. Mr. Squire conducted.

LADYWELL.—The first entertainment of the Sixth Series in aid of St. Mary's National Schools, Lewisham, was given on November 25, by Mr. Stephen Jarvis, assisted by Miss Rose Barnby, R.A.M., and the British Glee Union (Messrs. S. Barnby, H. Parkin, L. King, and Prenton), under the patronage of the Earl of Dartmouth, Viscount Lewisham, Hon. and Rev. Canon Legge, &c. Mr. Lovett King accompanied the various songs, &c., and contributed several buffo sketches, which added much to the enjoyment of an excellent programme, the arrangements of which were carried out under the direction of Herbert Furze, Esq., Hon. Sec.

LIVERPOOL.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave the fifth Concert of the present season on the 2nd ult. The principal attractions were the appearance of Senor Sarasate, the Spanish violin player, the revival of the finale to Mendelssohn's Loreley, the production for the first time in Liverpool of Raff's No. 3 Symphony, "Im Walde" ("In the Woods"), and of an Overture by Mr. Arthur O'Leary, which is associated with the same composer's incidental music to Longfellow's poem, "The Spanish Student." The Raff Symphony bears in every bar the impress of a man of genius, whose ideas gain greater significance owing to the daring originality of the orchestral medium through which they pass. Mr. O'Leary's overture is a bright and telling work by a composer evidently familiar with the resources of the modern orchestra. Sir Julius Benedict conducted.

LLANSTADWELL.—A Concert in aid of the Restoration Fund of the Parish Church was given on Friday evening, Nov. 28, at the National Schoolroom. The programme was divided into two parts, sacred and secular. The sacred portion consisted mainly of selections from Spohr's Last Judgment, which had evidently been most carefully practised. The second part contained well-known songs, which were very well received by the audience, the singing of Mr. Whitton being a special feature. A cornet solo was well given by Mr. Anthony James. Mrs. Avery acted as accompanist throughout the evening, and too much praise can scarcely be given for the careful way in which she performed her task. Mr. Clifton conducted.

LONDONDERRY.—The members of the St. Columbs Choral Union gave their first Annual Concert in the Corporation Hall on Thursday, the 4th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Barnett's Ancient Mariner, the principal solos being taken by Miss Macdonald and Messrs. Stewart and Fowles. The second part was miscellaneous. The Rev. W. H. Lang presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. R. Jones at the harmonium. The Concert was a great success. The organist of the cathedral, Mr. D. Jones, F.C.O., conducted.

MADELEY, SALOP.—On Friday, the 16th ult., the Madeley Choral Society gave a performance of the Messiah, with band and chorus of sixty performers. The band, led by Mr. Blythe, was selected from Birmingham. The vocalists were Mrs. Sutton, Miss Lloyd, Mr. Grayson, Mr. Amtice, Mr. Webb, and Mr. Harvey, these last three being members of the Society. There was a crowded audience, and the performance throughout most praiseworthy. Mr. Smart (Newport) was an efficient Conductor.

MADRAS.—A Concert was given (the first of the sixteenth season) on November 21 by the Madras Philharmonic Society, in the Banqueting Hall, Government House. The work selected was Barnett's Paradise and the Peri, with full orchestral accompaniment. The whole performance was very satisfactory, the solos being capitally rendered by members of the Society. The quartets were especially well sung, and the members of the orchestra are deserving of great praise for the admirable way in which they rendered their portion of the music. Mr. W. Douglas St Leger (Organist of St. George's Cathedral), the Musical Director of the Society, conducted.

MANCHESTER.—The members of the Vocal Society at their third Concert for the season, on the 10th ult., in addition to a miscellaneous selection, gave Méhul's Joseph, a work little known in England. The libretto was furnished by the president, B. St. J. B. Joule, Esq. Mr. George Fox took the rôle of Jacob, and Miss F. Bristow as Benjamin, and Mr. Thompson as Joseph, acquitted themselves very successfully.

MANSFIELD.—The Musical Society gave a performance on the 18th ult. of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, with a miscellaneous second part, consisting of ballads, part-songs, &c. The soloists, Miss McEwen and Mr. Dunkerton, were much appreciated. The accompanists were Miss Jolly and Mr. W. H. Garland, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and Mr. Ouston ably conducted. The Concert was very successful.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.—The Choral Society's first Concert of the season took place on November 25, when Macfarren's May Day and a miscellaneous selection were given. Mr. Franz Grönings conducted, and the Concert was a great success, the large hall being quite full. It is in contemplation to give Haydn's Seasons or a grand Oratorio next spring.——The Philharmonic Society gave the second Subscription Concert on the 17th ult., when the following artists appeared: Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. J. H. Pearson, Mdlle. B. Brousil (solo violin), Mons. J. A. Brousil (solo cello). The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Franz Grönings, gave an excellent rendering of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Mozart's Die Entführung (Overture), and Balfe's Bohemian Girl (Overture).

MODBURY.—A Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on Wednesday evening, November 26, under the direction of Mr. W. A. Davis, Organist of the Parish Church. The artists were Madame Thaddeus Wells, Miss Kate Baxter, Mr. Farley Sinkins, and Mr. Nicholson. The programme was well selected, and the entertainment, musically, highly successful.

MOSSLEY.—On Sunday, the 14th ult., the Anniversary Services in connection with the Wesleyan Chapel were held. A selection from the Messiah, including Recitative "Thy rebuke," and Air "Behold and see," sung by Mr. Maude, "But thou didst not leave," by Miss Buckley, and several Choruses were successfully rendered. Mendelssohn's As the hart pants, was also given. The accompaniments were played by a small band, the whole being under the direction of Mr. Watts Maude.

NEWPORT, SALOP.—On Thursday evening, the 11th ult., the Choral Society gave a Concert in the Town Hall, with a band and chorus of forty performers. The first part consisted of a selection from Samson. Mrs. Sutton gave "Ye men of Gaza" and "Let the bright seraphim" (encored) most artistically. Mr. Griffiths sang the pathetic air "Total eclipse" carefully and with feeling. The Choruses were well rendered. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Smart, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

NORTHAMPTON.—On Tuesday, the 9th ult., the choir of All Saints' Church gave a Concert in the Corn Exchange in aid of the Fund for repairing the Organ at the above-named church, Farmer's Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, being chosen for performance. The soloists were Miss Honeybone, Miss Hall, Mr. Adcock, and Mr. Kirkby. The band and chorus numbered upwards of 150 performers. Mr. Farmer ably conducted, and Mr. Ebenezer Law was organist.

PAISLEY.—A Concert was given in the Drill Hall on the 11th ult., by the members of the Paisley Philharmonic Society, a body of gentlemen amateurs who deserve to be commended for their taste in selecting, and their ability in playing, good music. The programme was exceptionally fine, and the manner in which it was performed reflected great credit upon the young conductor, Mr. W. T. Hoeck.

SIDMOUTH.—A most successful Concert was given on the 13th ult., at the Assembly Rooms. The programme contained a selection from the Messiah and some choice extracts from the works of popular composers. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Farley Sinkins; solo trumpet, Mr. McGarth. There was a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. H. A. Harding, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O., conducted.

SOUTHPORT.—Mr. J. S. Watson must feel satisfied with the support given to him this season by the Southport public. The crowded state of the Cambridge Hall on Tuesday evening, the 2nd ult., was a proof that the conscientious manner in which he caters for his patrons is thoroughly appreciated. Dussek's Sonata in B flat was rendered with much effect by Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé, and Heller and Ernst's three "Pensées Fugitives," so varied in their themes, and Kiel's characteristic "German Dances," were given not only with faultless powers of execution, but with an infinity of light, shade and expression. Madame Norman-Néruda's solos were selected so as to exhibit all her high qualities as a violinist. Vieuxtemps' "Thème Varié" showed her splendid style of bowing and the precision of her attack; and Raff's Cavatina gave the opportunity for the display of pathos and feeling, which gained in contrast by the brilliant execution of the Polonaise by Wieniawski, which it immediately preceded. Mr. Charles Hallé could not have made a better selection for a mixed audience than the "Moonlight Sonata," which he rendered in excellent style throughout. Mr. Watson, in securing the services of Miss Mary Davies, introduced a vocalist who takes very high rank as a ballad singer. She sings with great taste, her enunciation is distinct, and she infuses an amount of feeling and expression that impart a charm to even the most common-place drawing-room songs. She was much applauded, and recalled after each of her songs. Much praise is due to Mr. J. Hodgson for the manner in which he discharged the duties of accompanist.

SYDNEY.—The first of the Oratorios proposed to be given by the Sacred Choral Association took place in the Garden Palace on Saturday afternoon, November 15. After the choristers, numbering about 500, had filed into their places, Mr. Charles Packer's appearance upon his stand was the signal for applause. The principal vocalists were Miss Moon, Messrs. M. Winter, A. Parkinson, H. Wilkinson, and Andrew Fairfax. Mr. M. Younger presided at the organ, and Mr. H. R. M'Lean was the pianist. The orchestra was composed of fully fifty of the best players in the colony, Signor Ortori and Mr. N. La Feuillade being the principal violins. Miss Moon sang her music well, but in the severely classical style; Mr. Parkinson was very effective in the air "In native worth," Mr. Wilkinson was highly successful in the bass music, and Mr. Fairfax rendered good service in the duets with Miss Moon. The choruses were, as a rule, well given, the most successful being "Despairing cursing rage," in which the basses were particularly good; and "Achieved is the glorious work," which latter was loudly applauded. The band, perfectly under the command of Mr. Packer, was very effective, the introduction, the "Representation of Chaos," and some of the accompaniments being excellently played. The artists who presided at the organ and pianoforte also gave good assistance towards making the performance a genuine success.

TENBURY.—A miscellaneous Concert was given by the Tenbury Musical Society, on November 26. The principal items in the programme were Mozart's Splendente Te Deus, Schubert's Miriam's Song, and a Concerto by Mendelssohn, the pianoforte part of which was beautifully rendered by Mrs. Littleton Wheeler. Schubert's Cantata was given with great spirit by both band and chorus. On this occasion the Society relied entirely upon its own members for solo and chorus work, and the result was a great success, which must have afforded extreme satisfaction to its worthy Conductor, the Rev. J. Hampton.

TURNHAM GREEN.—A Concert was given in the Vestry Hall on the 17th ult. by Mr. Felix Sommer's Orchestral and Choral Society, numbering 150 performers. The orchestral numbers were a Symphony in C (Menuetto and finale), a Gavotte by Reyloff, and Marches from Eli, Abraham, and Le Prophète, which were very well rendered. Herr Orberthür contributed two harp solos, and Mr. Sommer gave two violin solos and a Tarantelle for piano composed by himself. All the choruses were accompanied by the full orchestra (fifty); Gounod's "Bethlehem," "Nazareth," "Trumpet Blow," Schumann's Gipsy Life, &c., being very effective. "The Maid of Judah," sung by Mrs. H. Taylor, elicited much applause, and Dr. Clabburn's "Vagabond" was encored. The hall was well filled, the Concert being in aid of the funds for the relief of the sick and aged poor.

WOOLWICH.—Miss Mascall's Concert took place at the Town Hall on the 8th ult., and was very successful, the hall being well filled, and the efforts of both vocalists and instrumentalists being much appreciated. The programme, which was a lengthy one, was largely contributed by Miss Mascall's pupils, and their playing as well as that of the concert-giver herself was warmly applauded.

YORK.—The Musical Society gave the second Concert of the season in the Festival Concert Rooms on the 17th ult., and everything passed off very successfully. The work selected was Handel's Oratorio the Messiah. The solos were sung by Madame Cross Lavers, Miss Damian, Mr. J. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Henry Cross. The choruses were effectively given, among the more prominent being "For unto us a child is born" and the "Hallelujah." The orchestra was conducted by Mr. Burton.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. S. J. Bradburn, Organist and Choirmaster to George Street Wesleyan Chapel, Hulme, Manchester.—Mr. H. Collingwood Banks to Christ's Hospital.

PREFACE.

"ACIS AND GALATEA" appears to have been composed for the Duke of Chandos about the year 1720, and was performed at Cannons in the year following.

As in many of Handel's works which were written about this period, the disposition of the chorus parts is such as to warrant the supposition that the choir he had to deal with was limited in its numbers (there being apparently no Altos), and exceptional in the compass of its Tenor voices. This conjecture is borne out by the fact that the omission of an Alto part, and the division of the Tenor into two or three parts, is common to nearly all the works which Handel wrote for the Duke of Chandos, but is found in scarcely any, if any, of his subsequent compositions.

It would be difficult otherwise to account for so unusual an arrangement, although it might have been supposed that when his connection with the choir at Cannons ceased, he would have rearranged the vocal parts and brought them more into conformity with the requirements of ordinary choirs. But it would seem that when his attention became absorbed in the production of his Oratorios, he laid aside the smaller works of the "Chandos" period, only taking them up to transfer a movement which might be required for the larger composition then in hand. This, however, would not account for a work of the importance of "Acis and Galatea" being left in its exceptional state; for if the size and attractive nature of the Serenata did not claim more than ordinary consideration at the hands of its composer, its performance in London twelve years later—presumably with a chorus not possessing the peculiarities of the Chandos choir—would appear to have demanded some revision of its voice parts.

Nothing, however, seems to have been done in that direction—if we except a pencilled memorandum by the composer on the 1st Tenor line of "Wretched lovers," "This part in Contralt."—until about thirty years ago, when an equally rough and ready expedient was adopted by the Handel Society under the advice of Sterndale Bennett, viz.: to give the 1st Tenor line of nearly all the choruses to the Altos. It need scarcely be said, that as the range of the remaining Tenor parts coincided almost exactly with the one transferred to the Altos, the difficulties could only be regarded as mitigated, not removed.

It was plain—and it must have forced itself upon the attention of those who have directed its performance, as well as on those singers who have been condemned to wrestle with its well-nigh impossible Tenor parts—that a more radical and systematic rearrangement was required to place this work upon an equal footing with others of its class.

With this desire alone has the present edition been prepared and published.

In addition to the occasional transposition of voice parts in certain choruses, the Editor is responsible for much of the Pianoforte accompaniment, for suggested abbreviations in the Airs, and for the marks of expression throughout.

Op. 16, Op. 45, Op. 46, Op. 47, Op. 90, Op. 125, Op. 138,

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

LINDSAY SLOPER.

Musical Times, November, 1879.

"Those who make teaching an art cannot too strongly insist upon the necessity of every pupil being well grounded in elementary principles. The many who commence in the middle spend a large portion of valuable time in trying to reach the end, or in struggling back to the beginning, and rarely, if ever, succeed in doing either. In the acquisition of music, vocal or instrumental, it is of vital importance that the right method shall be ensured in the first instance; and we give a cordial welcome therefore to any works which will contribute towards this desirable object. The Studies of Stephen Heller have been long known to and thoroughly appreciated by all good pianoforte teachers; but we have always been of opinion that a better arrangement as to progressive difficulty might have been effected by the composer. Some attempt to do this has already been made by Herr Hans Schmitt, of Vienna, who wrote out a table of the various studies in the order he would recommend them for practice. As the editor of the work now before us, however, truly remarks, 'to make a perfectly graduated study of them, it was necessary to be at once possessed of the entire work, consisting of twenty books.' Nothing, then, could be done to remove this objection but to place the work in the hands of an experienced master and rely upon his judgment to put them into the required order, so that the number of the book should indicate the degree of difficulty. This has been effectually accomplished in the edition just published. Mr. Lindsay Sloper, besides being a recognised public pianist, brings a large amount of experience in teaching to his task, and the result is highly satisfactory; for not only are the twenty books excellently classified for the practice of the student, but the books may be purchased separately, 'with the security,' as the editor tells us in his preface, 'that each study therein contained is of about equal mechanical difficulty with the rest.' In a previous edition of these Studies the composer says: 'I have wished to habituate both students and amateurs to execute a piece with the expression, grace, elegance, or energy required by the peculiar character of the composition. More particularly have I endeavoured to awaken in them a feeling for musical rhythm, and a desire for the most exact and complete interpretation of the author's intentions.' In justice to Mr. Lindsay Sloper these observations should be borne in mind, lest—as the classification is not strictly according to the mere mechanical difficulty of each study—it might be imagined that his arrangement was faulty. The delicate gradations of touch, so essential to the due performance of these thoughtful little pieces, require to be very carefully studied; and brain-work as well as finger-work must be considered in estimating 'difficulty.' We have carefully looked over the whole of the twenty books, and most conscientiously award the highest praise to the editor for the manner in which he has discharged a duty, which from his admiration of the Studies and his personal friendship with their composer, has evidently been a labour of love. The intrinsic musical beauty of all these pieces, as well as their usefulness in forming a refined and intellectual style of performance, should earn for them a world-wide acceptance; and we cannot but believe that, valuable as they have ever been, they will be doubly so in the form now issued to the public."

THE
OF ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.

(PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY, APRIL, JULY, AND OCTOBER.)

EDITED BY

WILLIAM SPARK, Mus. Doc.

The commencement of a new year of this useful and valuable periodical presents a favourable opportunity for new Subscribers to send their names to the Editor or the Publishers. Twenty pages of beautifully engraved New Organ Compositions are supplied to Subscribers, every quarter, for 2s. 6d.

Volumes I., II., III., IV., and V., each consisting of ONE HUNDRED and SIXTY PAGES of ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS for the ORGAN by the best living Organists and Composers (Foreign and English). Price, handsomely bound in cloth, 21s. each. Subscribers for not less than one year can commence at any period, and receive back numbers at the Subscription price. Annual Subscription, 10s.; Non-Subscribers, 5s. net each part.

"This number completes another year of Dr. Spark's journal. Begun at a time when the dearth of original organ music—of fresh compositions specially suited to the genius of the organ as a solo instrument—was severely felt, this work was purposed to supply the want. The fidelity with which this purpose has been carried out by Dr. Spark in the selection of material suited to all tastes and every degree of executive ability, and by the Messrs. Novello, in their admirable style of publication, is well known to every organist long ere this, while the fact of its continued existence, with character and vigour unimpaired, sufficiently proves that the competition which its earlier success naturally elicited has not lessened its relative value or restricted its popularity. In a word, all the promises with which the first number was laden have been more than fulfilled, so that there now exists a large work from which no organist can be at a loss to select what is suitable for church or concert purposes, or for his own private practice, while there is much in it that is good for teaching."—Dundee Advertiser.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this, or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of "Lieder ohne Worte." Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875 & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press :—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE.

"A. FETIS,
"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.
"D. MAGNUS."

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany.)"

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

"These Pianos have received the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")

THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

Price Lists and Illustrations free on application to us or to any Musicseller, through whom these Stools and other articles of Music Furniture can be obtained.

SCHUBERT SOCIETY.

President: SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.
Founder and Director: HERR SCHUBERTH.
FOURTEENTH SEASON.

PROSPECTUSES will be issued on February 14. The chief objects of the Society are the introduction of rising artists and performance of new compositions, both vocal and instrumental, thus affording an excellent opportunity to young composers and those desirous of making an appearance in public. Further particulars on application to H. G. Hopper, Hon. Secretary, 244, Regent Street, W.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY offer TWO PRIZES, of Ten Guineas and Five Guineas respectively, for the best and second best approved MADRIGALS, in not less than four, nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two treble voices. The character of the composition to be after the manner of the Madrigals of the 17th Century, by Bennet, Wilbye, Weelkes, Marenzio, and others, and to consist of independent part-writing, in figure or imitation; therefore a mere part-song or melody harmonised will be inadmissible. The following members of the Society have consented to act as judges, viz.:

REV. THOMAS HELMORE, M.A.,
JOHN STAINER, ESQ., M.A., Mus. Doc.,
KELLOW J. PYE, ESQ., and OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT, ESQ.

The Madrigals to be delivered addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street, London, on or before the 15th of July, 1880, each composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the Composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark. The award of the judges will be made known at the first meeting of the Society for the ensuing season, in November.

MODERN SYSTEMS OF HARMONY.

By James Lecky.

In Dr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," now in course of publication, there is an interesting notice by Mr. Hubert Parry of Dr. Alfred Day, author of a treatise on harmony. Mr. Parry gives a clear and accurate analysis of this work, and speaks of it in terms of high praise. "The principle which throughout characterises his system is to get behind the mere shallow statement of rules and exceptions to the underlying basis from which exceptions and rules will alike follow." And again: "Whatever may be said of its hypothetical and as yet incompletely substantiated views, it must be confessed that no other theory yet proposed can rival it in consistency and comprehensiveness. The strong adhesion given to it by one of our most distinguished living musicians, the Professor of Music at Cambridge, should be sufficient to recommend it."

Though approved by such high authority, this system has not escaped serious opposition. One of its chief features, the distinction between artificial and fundamental discords, has been severely dealt with by Dr. Stainer in his treatise on harmony; and at a meeting of the Musical Association, on February 1, 1875, Mr. C. E. Stephens exposed some of its fallacies with vigour and success. It will therefore be interesting to inquire what is the actual value of this system, which has now been before the world for thirty-four years, and is still a subject of dispute among musicians.

At the outset we must ask to what intonation does Day's theory apply? Such a question seems never to have occurred to Day himself, and in his work there is some confusion on the point. Thus he defines each musical interval as consisting of so many semitones, which can only apply to equal temperament, for in any other system there are two or more different kinds of semitone. Again, he often discusses whether a note should be written D♯ or E♭, a distinction which is practically important only when these symbols represent different sounds, as in the mean-tone system. Moreover, he describes the scale as derived from three conjunct triads, as F A C, C E G, G B D, which is true only in just intonation.

It is evidently absurd to found our theory on one system of tuning and our practice on another. The equal temperament is now in such general use that theorists are perfectly justified in taking it for their basis, as Dr. Stainer and others have done. The mechanic simplicity of this temperament has driven out of use other systems which are far more harmonious, but which require a larger number of notes to the octave. Thus, the mean-tone system, which was used, though in an incomplete, restricted form, from the time of Palestrina to that of Handel and Bach, requires at least twenty-four notes to the octave. The practical use of this and other enharmonic systems has been made possible for the first time by the generalised keyboard recently invented by Mr. Bosanquet. He has also clearly shown that certain chords and progressions, which sound well in equal temperament, are unendurable in just intonation; and he has made valuable suggestions as to the treatment suitable to the improved systems of tuning.*

* See "Elementary Treatise on Musical Intervals and Temperament," by R. H. M. Bosanquet.

Day knew nothing of this, and his work is applicable only to the mean-tone system or to equal temperament.

Day's definitions of chords and scales are merely formal. He tells us how to find the various intervals on the keyboard, but he does not attempt to explain how these intervals are obtained. He divides chords into consonant and dissonant, but does not say in what consonance and dissonance consist. This is not surprising, for the true explanation of the affinity of sounds, of consonance and of dissonance, was unknown till seventeen years after Day wrote. Seventeen more years have elapsed since Helmholtz's discoveries were published, but they appear to be still unknown to the writers of musical text-books. We find, instead, strange speculations, either contrary to observation or outside the reach of observation altogether. Thus, in Dr. Stainer's treatise we read: "If any interval smaller than a third be heard, it requires to be adjusted to a third before the ear is satisfied. This unsatisfactory effect of an interval smaller than a third is termed discordant." But there are many discords to which this does not apply, and Dr. Stainer accounts for them thus: "The discordant interval may be implied or expressed. Thus  contains no interval less than a third, but as the note D is implied it is a discord." But the note D is not there at all, and cannot affect our ears in any way. The theory of "implied notes" is no explanation, for dissonance is a sensible fact, and must therefore have a sensible cause. The true explanation is that C-F♯ beats like any other dissonance, the 3rd and 4th partials of C interfering with the 2nd and 3rd partials of F♯ respectively, thus:
Day attempts to give a theory of only one class of chords, which he calls "fundamental, because every harmony springs from one of three certain roots or fundamentals, and can only be taken on certain notes of the key. By root or fundamental is meant that note, being a diatonic note of the scale, which will amongst its harmonics first produce the notes of which any chord is composed" (p. 54). Day uses the word "harmonics" in two senses; first, to signify a series of musical notes whose vibration numbers are as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, &c.: second, to signify the series of simple partial tones of which an ordinary musical sound is composed. This ambiguous use of the word is also found in some recent writers.

The list of harmonics which Day gives on p. 51 is erroneous. "The harmonics from any given note [say G] (without taking the order in which they arise but their practical use) are, major third [B], perfect fifth [D], minor seventh [F], minor or major ninth, [A♭ or A♮], eleventh [C], and minor or major thirteenth" [E♭ or E♮]. There can be no doubt as to the notes Day means, for on p. 107 he directs F-C, C-G, G-D to be tuned as fifths, and A♭-C, E♭-G, C-E, G-B as major thirds, adding that "the intervals are not to be tempered; that is, they are to be tuned quite perfect, without a beat."

It is easy to show that neither C, nor E♭, nor A♭, nor E, nor F, when thus obtained, can ever be harmonics of G. The note A is not defined, so that he may have meant the fifth of D or the third of F. The remaining notes in Day's list, D and B, are only harmonics of G when taken as twelfth and seventeenth of the bass respectively.

The error of Day's system is, that he disregards the partial tones of all the notes in the chord, except of that note which he calls the root.* Hence he cannot explain the minor third, major third, fourth, fifth, minor sixth or major sixth, for none of these are harmonics. He acknowledges this with regard to the minor third, and he calls it therefore "an arbitrary, not a natural third" (p. 54). Yet it is as easy to explain the minor third as any other consonance; the 6th partial of G is identical with the 5th partial of B♭. The error we have pointed out is by no means peculiar to Day; it is found in Rameau, and in nearly all theorists before Helmholtz. Even now it is constantly repeated by writers who have better opportunities of learning the truth than had Rameau or Day.

The definition of a root which Day gives is inapplicable to a great number of musical chords. It is true that in a chord of this form  the bass note stands to the other notes of the chord in the same relation as the prime stands to the upper partial tones of the compound note  . But, in chords of any other form, the theorist is compelled to fall back on the notion of implied or imaginary roots. Thus in the major triad  no note is a harmonic of either of the other two. It is true that both G-B and B-D produce the difference tone  , but this is a simple tone, and therefore does not stand in the relation of a compound tone to its harmonics, as was the case in the first chord. Again, the minor triad  can have no root according to Day's definition, for B♭ is no harmonic of G nor of D, and G is no harmonic of B♭ nor of D. If the rule will not apply to the consonant triads we need not test it with regard to dissonances. No doubt Day took his theory from Rameau; but Rameau's system, though a great advance on all previous ones, is now completely superseded by the researches of Helmholtz. The relation between two notes such as  , was formerly supposed to consist in their both being harmonics of  ; it is now shown to consist in their both possessing the same partial tone  .

When stripped of its pretended science, Day's theory reduces itself to a series of thirds taken from the scale. Thus the notes he derives from G, namely, B, D, F, A♭, A, C, E♭ and E, may be separated into two chords, G-B-D-F-A-C-E and G-B-D-F-A♭-C-E♭, the former taken from the major scale of C, the latter from the minor. Dr. Stainer has recently developed this method further by building up a series of thirds on the tonic, by which means he gets C-E-G-B-D-F-A and C-E♭-G-B-D-F-A♭. The first note of each of these chords Dr. Stainer considers to be the root. He fails, however, to show that the ear perceives any peculiar character or function in this root, which would distinguish it from all the other notes of the chord. Moreover, many chords cannot be reconciled with this theory, except by supposing a large number of implied sounds. To take an extreme case, A♭-C-E♭-F♯ is explained by Day and by Dr. Stainer as derived from G-B-D-F-A♭ and D-F♯-A-C-E♭. But it is evident that the notes G, B, D, F and A, which are not in the chord at all, cannot affect our ears in any way. The method of treating a chord of few notes as part of a chord of many notes explains nothing, and has brought much confusion into musical theory. It is far more reasonable to treat every chord as consisting of as many pairs of notes as it contains. Thus A♭-C-E♭-F♯ consists of A♭-E♭, A♭-C, C-E♭, which are consonant, and of A♭-F♯, C-F♯, E♭-F♯, which are dissonant. This method is employed and justified by Dr. Pole in his recent work on the "Philosophy of Music."

Day did not try to give any theory of "diatonic dissonances": he called them artificial and unnatural (p. 51). Yet the explanation of the affinity of sounds, of consonance and of dissonance, applies to all kinds of chords equally. The so-called fundamental chords are not more natural nor less artificial than any others, and the distinction on which Day insists, that diatonic discords must be prepared while fundamental need not, has been shown by Dr. Stainer to be groundless.

A formidable list might be made of the chords which Day forbids, but we shall only notice one of these, the augmented fifth on the dominant. Mr. Parry says that Day "brought to bear both mathematics and practical experiment to prove" that this chord cannot be used; and Professor Macfarren refers to his arguments as "unanswerable." The "mathematics" are merely some simple arithmetic. He says (pp. 105-6): "It is not generally known that a diatonic semitone, as it is called, is really larger than a chromatic one, which is the case; therefore E♭ is sharper than D♯, as the following will prove. Take any given note, say C, as 1, the ratio of the octave is $\frac{1}{2}$, that of the fifth $\frac{2}{3}$, ergo that of the fourth $\frac{3}{4}$; the ratio of the major third is $\frac{4}{5}$, ergo of the minor sixth $\frac{5}{8}$, and of the minor third $\frac{5}{6}$.

D♯ of $\frac{4}{5}$ B of $\frac{2}{3}$ G $= \frac{8}{15}$; octave below $= \frac{64}{75}$. E♭ $\frac{5}{6}$.

Reduce $\frac{5}{6}$ and $\frac{64}{75}$ to common denominator.

$5 \times 75 = 375$. $64 \times 6 = 384$. $75 \times 6 = 450$.

$\frac{384}{450} - \frac{375}{450} = \frac{9}{450} = \frac{1}{50} - \frac{1}{2}$ (the ratio of the octave); $= \frac{1}{25}$; ergo, E♭ is $\frac{1}{25}$ of an octave sharper than D♯."

It is evident that this passage teems with errors. If C be 1, then G is $\frac{3}{2}$ not $\frac{2}{3}$, and all the other numbers are wrong in the same way. It is true that C is to D♯ as 64 to 75, and the same C to E♭ as 5 to 6. But by multiplying 6 by 75 Day identifies E♭ and D♯ and gets two different Cs. Again, it is absurd to bring the two fractions to a common denominator and subtract; he should have divided one by the other. What $\frac{1}{50}$ means here we cannot say, but the minus sign which follows is no doubt a misprint for the sign of division. It is absurd to divide an interval by $\frac{1}{2}$ to find how often it goes into an octave. He should have found to what power the improper fraction representing the interval between E♭ and D♯ must be raised to equal 2.

The interval between E♭ and D♯ may be found much more simply thus. Tune 3 major thirds up from E♭  and also an octave up from E♭  . We hear that E♭ is the higher sound, and we see by calculation that it must be so. Three major thirds $= \frac{5}{4} \times \frac{5}{4} \times \frac{5}{4} = \frac{125}{64}$, and an octave $= 2$. Then $2 \div \frac{125}{64} = \frac{128}{125}$. Therefore E♭ is sharper than

* This was first pointed out by Mr. Bosanquet ("Proceedings of the Musical Association," 1874-5, p. 125).

D♯ by $\frac{128}{125}$. To avoid tediousness we will use logarithms to find how often this interval goes into an octave. The log. of $\frac{128}{125}$ is ·01030, and the log. of 2 is ·30103 and the quotient is 29·2. . . . Hence E♭ is sharper than D♯ by nearly $\frac{1}{29}$ of an octave, or nearly $\frac{1}{5}$ of a major tone.

But this is evidently no reason why we may not use D♯ as augmented fifth on the dominant G. "To those to whom the above" [his mathematics] "may be unsatisfactory or unintelligible," Day recommends a practical experiment. The following chords are to be tuned in just intonation:

and Day thinks that "the mere sound will, independently of all reasoning, set the question at rest (at least with the hearers) for ever, and put it beyond a doubt that no augmented fifth can be taken on the dominant."

The question has however not been set at rest, and Day's argument will not bear out his conclusion. The chord G-B-F-A♭-D♯ does indeed produce a horrible and unmusical effect; but this is due to the false interval or "wolf" A♭-D♯. Leave out the A♭, and G-B-F-D♯ sounds perfectly well. Day would no doubt maintain that, whether A♭ be heard or not, it is implied in the chord G-B-F-D♯; but on this as on so many other points his views may be regarded as obsolete. The chord G-B-F-E♭ also resolves perfectly well on C-E♮, and in melody D, E♭, E♮, has perhaps a better effect than D, D♯, E.

The pitches which Day assigns to D♯ and E♭ are not the only ones possible in just intonation. If we take D♯ to mean 8 fifths up (or fourths down) from G, we get a note almost identical with E♭, the major third below G. The ordinary notation is very ambiguous when applied to just intonation; additional signs have therefore to be used to indicate the exact sound intended.* The ordinary notation corresponds perfectly to the mean-tone system of temperament, in which the fifth is tuned flat, but the major third just. In this system there is but one D♯ and one E♭, and the latter is sharper than the former by nearly $\frac{1}{5}$ of an octave. So long as this system was in general use, errors of notation could hardly occur, for they would mean errors of pitch. At present, musicians are for the most part unacquainted with any intonation but equal temperament, and errors of notation are therefore constantly found.

Day asks, "What possible sense could be made of" this chord G-B-F-D♯? The chord is satisfactory in practice, and if it will not fit in with his theory, so much the worse for the theory. We touch here the radical difference between Day's view of musical science and that which now prevails. He tries to deduce from abstract principles what music ought to be: anything he cannot reconcile with those principles he denounces as arbitrary and unnatural. Perhaps that is the best thing he could do under the circumstances. Let us rather take as music what the ear judges to be such, and demand from science an explanation of the ear's decision. There are indeed many rules in music which science cannot explain, but which are justified by experience.

We are therefore unable to join Mr. Parry in the eulogy quoted at the beginning of this article, for we think that Dr. Day misrepresented the natural facts on which he professed to base his system, that his classification of chords is unnatural and impossible, and that he did not understand the nature of the problems which music offers to science. The theoretic part of his system is valueless, and the practical part has long been superseded by more musicianlike works.

Yet it must be acknowledged that Day appears to advantage beside many of his rival theorists. He is beset by no strange delusions about "chromatic alteration" or "negative harmonics"; and he keeps clear of the Serbonian bog of ancient and mediæval music in which so many have lost themselves. His examples of chords and resolutions are very numerous, and many of them might occur in music. Lastly, his style is so clear and straightforward that his errors become doubly evident, and we are therefore the more surprised to find them still so widely accepted.

CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

By J. Powell Metcalfe.

We will now suppose that the secretary has ascertained what choirs within the district he proposes to occupy are willing to associate—having given all the option of so doing—and that all have been supplied with the number of copies of music they require, being not less than the number of singers they propose to bring to the festival, and that these copies have been paid for on receipt for the ease of the account-keeping; that the three—or more if thought advisable—rehearsals of the home teachers, with such clergy, ladies, and others as can be got to attend, have been duly held at convenient centres and on fitting days (generally, for the convenience of the schoolmasters, Saturdays, morning or afternoon); and that time has been given for the instruction imparted at these rehearsals by the precentor to be passed on to the choirs.

The precise day of the festival will now have to be fixed, in due regard to local market-days and the like—as a rule, within the two or three weeks preceding hay-time and the two or three weeks intervening between the end of hay-time and the beginning of harvest; and the rehearsals of the choirs in groups will now commence. Care should be taken that these rehearsals do not degenerate into mere lessons at which the precentor will be expected to do the work that the home teacher ought to have done: it is not his place to teach the right notes, or that this is a natural and not a sharp; all that should be done before he comes. It will help to check this if a rigid rule be made that the rehearsals be attended by three choirs at least; and as the attendance at two rehearsals only will probably suffice, this rule cannot be considered too hard, unless the distances apart are unusually large.

If possible, let it be arranged that the organist of the church in which it is settled to hold the festival—which, except in very unusual cases, will be that of one of the associated choirs—accompany at each of these rehearsals; and by no means, without special cause, let him be displaced from his organ-stool on the festival-day. It will be quite time enough to find a strange organist when the proper one displays an antagonism that won't be worked with, or—a very much more likely thing—modestly shrinks from assuming responsibilities in mistrust of his powers.

Except in those churches where that most common-sense arrangement has been adopted of carrying the organ-trackers across to the opposite side, so that the organist, instead of being boxed up among his pipes, is so removed as to be able to hear the tone he causes as others hear it, to aid his choir by his voice and eye, and himself be aided by seeing what is going on around him—except in such favoured churches it will be advisable, rather absolutely necessary, that precentor should be able to see organist's face and organist precentor's face by means of a small mirror fixed above the organ-keys. Let no rehearsal, much less festival, be attempted without this. Let the precentor be firm on this point. Without this simple contrivance there can be no sympathy with his beat, no restfulness, no steadiness. The organist will have to be for ever turning round to look, unless he goes his own way in spite of precentor.

And now, at length, we come to the long-expected festival-day, which has, we conclude, been duly advertised by bill and newspaper. If the gathering of choirs be of no great size, it will be found in every way better to make the afternoon cover all, including the journey to the church of meeting. If for nothing else, it saves that perplexing and expensive dinner; and those who may be able to get away for the half-day might be quite unable to get away for the whole day. But as the preliminary rehearsal will be more for the sake of arrangement of seating and such detail than the practice of the music—which by this time will be, if ever it will be, well known—and as the precentor will wisely be unwilling to fag his voices, half-an-hour will suffice. Another half-hour while the congregation are assembling, and the service itself, will yet leave ample portion of the summer afternoon and evening for return home, even after tea, to the choirs, separate or united.

It will be found a wholesome check upon the singers outside the church, as well as of the very greatest help to the precentor inside, if the members of the several choirs were required to wear a distinctive badge—a small coloured cross or miniature banner, pinned with a safety pin on the left breast, or even a scrap of ribbon in the button-hole, according to the fancy, care, or carelessness of the manager of the choir. A specimen of each, whatever it be, should be sent to the precentor before the festival-day, that he may at a glance know to what choir each singer belongs. The marshalling of the forces is half the battle; the arrangement of the singers is half the festival. To place the better where they can do most good, and the worse where they can do least harm, must be the care of the precentor. This is a delicate duty, this placing of singers; the wise precentor will do it firmly, but with as few words as possible. The particular form of the church will necessarily affect the special arrangement of choirs, so that general rules can hardly be laid down. The surpliced choirs, if any, may be placed in front, with the unsurpliced behind them; or the unsurpliced may be seated before the people facing eastward, the surpliced occupying the chancel. The trebles or sopranos will be before the men; the altos, being generally very deficient in numbers, must be so stationed as to tell best; but tenors and basses need not be separated from each other. Choirs will sing better if kept as much together as may be.

One arrangement it would be well always to follow—that is, to seat a band of reliable ladies, sopranos and contraltos, between the people and the chancel, facing eastwards, close to where the precentor will station himself.

Should there be no surpliced singers, all will quietly take the places they occupied at rehearsal ten minutes before the hour fixed for the commencement of the service; and, after a voluntary in the same key, the hymn set for the processional will be started on the organ, and sung while the clergy enter in procession and take their places. Should there be surpliced singers, while the unsurpliced take their places in church the surpliced will repair to the school-room or other place appointed and, after robing, be marshalled for the procession.

Now let us at once understand that the procession is to the precentor the most unsatisfactory part of the whole service; it is, in fact, the only part that he will ever feel to be wholly out of hand, and in which he must trust to mere chance. If there be width enough in the church for four abreast, the best formation is the boys two and two within and their men on each side. The more general formation will have to be two pairs of boys, then two men, as far as may be. The boys must always have men close at hand—firstly, to keep the harmony moderately complete; secondly, to steady the boys. There is no greater mistake than to send the boys by themselves; what between their carelessness and their nervousness, they are sure either to break away into a gallop, or break down altogether. At the head of the procession should be placed a right trusty quartet of voices, who on entering the church should fall back, still singing lustily to the precentor's beat, allowing the procession to pass between them, and ready to fall in again immediately before the clergy. For any awkward corner in the course a reliable man must be told off, who shall both sing and carry on the precentor's beat, taken up directly, or may be from another. These precautions taken, the jangling bells must be stopped, and the organist warned to bring his voluntary to an end in a key that will not grate harshly on the tune that will soon be heard. The precentor may then start the processional hymn, and one verse having been sung standing still, to fix well the time, he may then lead the way to the church.

It is hardly in the scope of this paper to suggest who shall say the service or who shall preach, yet of the first it may be said it is to be hoped that if the incumbent of the church mistrusts his own powers, he will not go beyond the clergy of the associated choirs for a deputy, as if the ancient accentus ecclesiasticus—the mere uninflected speech of the church—demanded a skilled singer for its use, or one prepared for the work by a singing-master. And of the preacher may it be requested that if he has nothing more to the purpose of the day to say than what he finds in his encyclopædia under the head "Music (Church)," or exhortation to the people to join in off-hand what the choirs assembled have given so many hours of patient toil to get up, he will think of those poor boys, their long journey and exciting day, and let them off with a really short sermon.

And now let us suppose the festival-day well and happily over, and all expenses connected with it duly discharged, leaving, as it will be sure to do with the economical management we have suggested, a pleasant balance to go on with.

"Nothing succeeds like success," and the secretary will now be astonished to find how the festival-day's proceedings have replaced halting head-shaking and doubtfulness as to the expediency of this or that by congratulations and expressions of oneness of thought, no less for the past than the present. We have had specially in view the two or three earnest neighbours forming their small union for the improvement of their own choirs. Their work is of its very nature unselfish; and that which began with the hope of good at home will soon grow into a desire for the good of others. As church workers they will of necessity be guided in their thoughts by ecclesiastical division, and so their rural deanery will at once occur to them as the proper sphere for the extension of their work. It will be very unlikely that they will find difficulty in obtaining the hearty sympathy of their rural dean. The rural dean has been placed at his post as a worker, and a worker will always sympathise with work; and the ruri-decanal chapter will supply the opportunity to bring forward the question of choral association.

But let the working secretary be on his guard, and on no account allow the reins to be taken out of his hands for the sake of some fancy and theoretical organisation. He is already a secretary by best of all credentials—work done. Let him keep his office, and, if need be, retire on his base, and work on with his two or three true brethren, and wait and watch. Objectors, many and various, doubtless he will have to face, but he is sure too to meet with true men, who will be most grateful to be shown the way of improvement—practical men who, though they might not themselves originate the work, or might, in fact, hold aloof from schemes and theory, will yet heartily fall in with that which they see really working for good. And with these additional members the now ruri-decanal union may proceed on its way on the very same lines as ensured success to the smaller organisation.

Yet still onward. Cannot our choral secretary still further extend the good work? Cannot he move the waters in other rural deaneries? Let him see if he cannot get invitations to attend the meetings of neighbouring ruri-decanal chapters, there to explain the mode of working he has found to succeed at home. If a man of the right stuff for choral secretary is at hand, let him take up the workings of his own deanery as, if we may so call it, "a separate watertight compartment"; if not, let our secretary offer to carry on the work till such man appear.

It will be found in practice that nothing is more conducive to healthy life in choral organisation than change of ground and circumstance for the festival. If possible, a festival should not be held in the same church two years in succession. It is quite within the range of possibility that a certain amount of heat in the attrition of working may have been elicited that may take more than a year to cool; at any rate, there must be an amount of staleness that will assuredly militate against the desired heartiness and interest among both choirs and the people of the neighbourhood; and though it is not the first reason of existence of choral associations, as a matter of fact choral festivals do excite choral feeling, and it cannot but be well that such advantage should be diffused by change of church.

And a wholesome change of circumstances as well as of ground will be provided if every third year the smaller independent unions could unite in larger festivals, to be held in the nobler churches of the district. If, for instance, the several ruri-decanal unions of an archdeaconry could hold festival in the chief church of that archdeaconry. For this the several secretaries and precentors of the different unions would necessarily form the acting committee. There would be many knotty points to be decided doubtless by this committee—Who shall select the music? Who shall be the conductor of the day? Who shall decide the one way that must first be communicated to the precentors in a united rehearsal, and by them transmitted to their home teachers for the further passing on? But if it be from the very first understood that any member of the acting committee is at liberty at any time to withdraw and to carry on his work independently in his own union, leaving it, however, quite open to any of his choirs to attend the larger festival under the management and direction of the remaining members of the acting committee, sufficient elasticity will have been provided to prevent disruption or deadlock.

The afternoon will not be found sufficient for these larger festivals, as many of the choirs will come from considerable distances, and the rehearsal will have to be much longer and more carefully conducted, and therefore must be held in the morning, that the voices may have time to rest before the afternoon festival service.

These larger meetings doubtless have advantages of their own, and it must certainly be confessed that, as a rule, they are the more popular; but the secretary will go back to his little afternoon meeting in the country village with the feeling that, if there is less display and show, there is certainly more work done in improvement for home service, and with very much less danger and peril to the singers who join.

The improvement of our choirs for home service—that is our aim; by association—that is our means. Let us be on our guard lest the unwise desire for the extension of the means make us lose sight of our rightful aim. Let us look to build rather in compartments, so that the filling of one may not be the foundering of another.

There is still another form of choral association that it will be found most advisable to superadd to the more general, in which whole choirs of very differing powers meet in the united festival service.

It must be borne in mind that a rightly selected service-book will be such as will supply subjects for interested practice to the choir of medium power for some months before the festival-day.

The precentor will probably find it advisable to forbid the yet weaker choirs attempting to get up the anthem or the more difficult parts of the anthem; but there are likely to be one or two choirs in the union to whom the music will present such small difficulty that three or four practices will suffice to make it safe. These, then—the best choirs of the district—will necessarily find far less to interest them in the service-book than the other choirs, and most certainly will find far less to profit them in using it in union with them. And yet the existence and active life of these better choirs is of the greatest choral moment to the whole district. They act as invaluable leaven.

It is for the sake of these better choirs, and the better singers of other choirs around them, that the second form of association is to be so strongly recommended. They necessarily require more advanced music to act on them as the service-book acts on others: and this more advanced music can best be supplied by retaining the service and its preparation as the means to the end, but taking as the anthem one of the many very beautiful small oratorios our own English composers have given us, but which, in spite of their beauty and solid goodness and, we may add, cheapness of publication, are so seldom heard, either whole or in part, where they have best right to be heard, namely, in our churches. The unusual length of "the anthem" of such kind will necessitate an adjustment of the rest of the service, which can best be effected by dispensing with the sermon, and using the legal "Shortened Service."

For many reasons it will be far better that this second association should be kept separate and distinct from the first and more general, both financially and otherwise, even though the same precentor and secretary conduct and manage the business of both, and the singers of the more select take part in the festivals of the larger.

The far simpler way will be for the inner association, if we may so call it, to accept all expenses, and retain the offertory of its services; and no better manner can be devised of employing the balance that remains, when all expenses are met, than appropriating it, with all donations and subscriptions collected for the purpose, to a fund for the relief in sickness of associates who have sung at services of the association, and have paid a trifling annual subscription by way of attachment. A five-pound note towards a doctor's bill, or to help a convalescent to a breath of sea-air, may come in as a very substantial boon; and the knowledge that all funds realised by the working of the association will be devoted to such excellent purpose will add an additional and special zest to the pleasures derived from brotherly association in congenial enjoyment.

But let the greatest care be exercised as far as possible to exclude all sense of rivalry and jealousy in the working of the two associations. There need not be the slightest clashing, specially if care be taken that the festivals be held at different times of year, say spring and autumn. But great is the ingenuity of some minds in fanning small sparks of difference into flames of antagonism; great the sharpness of some eyes in seeing things in a party colour. But the wise choral-worker will know full well he has to work with things as they are, and not as they should be. He knows that it is a great law of nature that movement, unless all in one direction—even unless all at one rate—produces chafing, produces heat. He welcomes the movement, yet watches and guards against this its attribute, so often of unpleasant consequence. As he strengthens himself in his work so he tries to draw forth true work in others, by calling to mind the foundation-purpose of all—not display, not mere enjoyment, but the improvement of church-music to the glory of God and the edification of the people.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

Having, last month, traced the progress of "Elijah" from the first mention of that work in these letters to the last, we must now go back to the year 1839, and to a part of that year when Mendelssohn was paying a visit to Frankfort. With reference to that time—a perfect holiday—the master wrote to Carl Klingemann in terms of contagious enthusiasm, and worthy of quotation as showing his intense enjoyment of life: "The summer months I recently passed in Frankfort have thoroughly refreshed me. In the morning I worked, then bathed or sketched; in the afternoon I played the organ or piano, and afterwards rambled in the forest; then went into society or home, where I ever found the most charming of all society. This was the mode in which my life was daily spent, and you must add to all this the glorious summer days which followed each other in uninterrupted succession." But while spending his time so happily, Mendelssohn did not omit to take stock of men and things about him in his own shrewd fashion. He found the Frankfort musicians anything save what they should have been—anything, though he does not say so, save what he was. Here is a description occurring in a letter to Fanny Hensel, after some remarks upon the "eccentric Capellmeister Guhr": "Now, is not Guhr a singular being? Yet I can get on better with him than with any other of the Frankfort musicians. He enjoys life, and lives and lets live, but is sharp enough as a director, and beats common time so distinctly that they cannot fail to play to it, as if they were in arm-chairs. But my other colleagues here are so desperately melancholy, always talking of musical critiques, and recognition, and flattering testimonials, and constantly thinking about themselves, and constantly fishing for compliments—but these compliments must be genuine, they even aspire to outpourings of the heart! This is both provoking and sad, and yet, behind people's backs, they can play as mad pranks as any one." Mendelssohn then goes on to speak of their performances, and shows himself as nobly impatient of perfunctoriness as the horses of Apollo might be of the slow motion of an ass: "At the Concert of the St. Cecilia Association, where I had an opportunity of fairly estimating the state of their music, I felt quite melancholy at the difference between it and our music in Leipzig, for, though it goes on fairly, and sometimes sounds well, still, as a rule, it seems as if they were playing from sheer weariness, or from compulsion, and vastly little of that zeal and love are apparent in the orchestra which so often prevail among us. In fact, when I compare the whole orchestral life here with ours at Leipzig, I feel just as I did when I returned from Düsseldorf and thought myself in Paradise." How the thorough artist who lives in, and for, and by his art, breathes through every word of these extracts! But this is not all. Writing subsequently to Klingemann, respecting an anonymous musician who had thoughts of settling in London, the master uttered words of wisdom as lofty as profound: "I am convinced that it would not be for his benefit were he to assume a position in the world which would oblige him to take an interest in so many things, not only foreign to art, but also adverse to it. A certain number of guineas might accrue to him, but no real gain, either for his happiness or his artistic progress. Formerly I used positively to hate all speculators in art, but now I feel chiefly compassion for them, because I see so few who are at rest. It is a never-ending strife for money and fame, and the most superior talents, as well as inferior ones, are wrecked by it. Highly as I esteem X——, I am by no means sure that he would not make shipwreck on this rock, and even if he did not lose the brightest part of his art, he would certainly have to deplore the best part of his life and happiness, and all for what? The reformation or improvement of great cities, even were they as important as London, is, in fact, either impossible or indifferent. If a man only strives thoroughly to perfect his own being, and to purify himself by degrees from all dross, he is working for all cities alike; and if he does so even in a village, his labours are certain to make their way into the world, and there exercise their due influence." This last sentence should be inscribed in letters of brass upon the desk or easel of every man who follows art.

In September of this year (1839) Mendelssohn was asked to take under his charge, as music-teacher, a talented son of Professor Naumann, of Bonn, and in his reply to the father we, for the first time, meet with his own opinion of himself as an artistic pedagogue. It is by no means flattering, and not more remarkable for sincerity than for the practical sagacity we have so often had occasion to admire: "I should unworthily respond to your confidence did I not communicate frankly to you the many and great scruples which prevent my immediately accepting your offer. In the first place, I am convinced, from repeated experience, that I am totally deficient in the talent requisite for a practical teacher, and for giving regular progressive instruction. Whether it be that I take too little pleasure in tuition, or have not sufficient patience for it, I cannot tell; but, in short, I do not succeed in it. Occasionally, indeed, young people have stayed with me; but any improvement they may have derived was always solely from our playing together, from unreserved intercourse or casual conversation on various subjects, and perhaps also from earnest discussions; all this being rather incompatible with actual teaching. Now the question is whether, in such early youth, a consecutive, unremitting, strict course of discipline be not of more value than all the rest. It also appears to me that the estrangement of your son from the paternal roof just at his age forms a second and not less important objection. Where the rudiments of education are not wholly wanting, I consider that the vicinity of his parents, and the prosecution of the usual elements of study, the acquirement of languages, and the various branches of scholarship and science, are of more value to a boy than a one-sided, however perfect, cultivation of his genius. In any event such genius is sure to force its way to the light, and to shape its course accordingly, and in riper years will submit to no other permanent vocation. Thus the early treasures of interest then acquired, and the hours enjoyed in early youth under the roof of a parent, become doubly dear. I speak in this strain from my own experience, for I can well remember that in my fifteenth year there was a question as to my studying with Cherubini, in Paris, and I know how grateful I was to my father at the time, and often since, that he at last gave up the idea and kept me with himself." It is much to be wished that those who have the control of young musical genius would bear these words in mind. In most cases where a youth gives evidence of special musical ability he is put into a forcing-pit, and grows up "one-sided"—a musician, no doubt, but destitute of the culture without which every man, no matter what his vocation, goes through life at a disadvantage, as an intellectual cripple. The reproach is often thrown at musicians that, beyond the limits of their art, they know nothing. We cannot deny that there is much truth in the taunt, and, though a good deal of it may arise from causes peculiar to music, much must be attributed to a want of the common sense so well expressed in our last quotation. With such common sense these letters abound more and more as the writer gains experience, and it would be easy to fill page after page, ad infinitum, with "words of truth and soberness." But enough, for the present, if one extract, anent monuments to great men, be given. A certain Herr Pott had been agitating for money, apparently to be expended on a statue of Bach in Leipzig, and to this project Mendelssohn refers: "I have not assisted Pott's undertaking by any musical contribution. If you could only see the detestable proceedings in Germany at present with regard to monuments, you would have given nothing either. They speculate on great men, in order, through their reputation to make a name for themselves, and trumpet forth in the newspapers, while with their real trumpets they make very bad music, 'as deadening as a foggy breeze.' If Halle for Handel, Salzburg for Mozart, and Bonn for Beethoven, &c., are really desirous to form good orchestras, capable of playing and comprehending thoroughly their works, then I shall be delighted to give them my aid, but not for mere stones, when the orchestras are themselves even more worthless stones, and not for their conservatoriums, when there is nothing worth conserving. My present hobby is our poor orchestra and its improvement. By dint of incessant running to and fro, writing and tormenting others, I have at last contrived to scrape together 500 thalers, and before I leave this they must have twice that sum. If the town does this, it can then proceed to erect a monument to Bach in front of the Thomas School. But, first of all, the extra pay."

In the first month of 1840, Mendelssohn, who had all along been desirous of writing an opera and unable to find a libretto, expressed himself very fully upon exigencies which his fastidiousness could never see satisfied. Herr Fürst, of Berlin, had written to him respecting a libretto he had in hand, and Mendelssohn replied asking to have a look at the scenarium, or skeleton of the drama. In response, Fürst good-humouredly twitted the composer with wishing to "raise difficulties from the starting point and bring the child into the world in its embryonic condition." This drew from Mendelssohn an elaborate answer, in which he said: "What deters me, and has always deterred me from the composition of a libretto, is neither the verse, nor the individual words, nor the mode of handling (or whatever you call it), but the course of the action, the dramatic essence, the march of events—in short, the scenarium. If I do not consider this to be good and solid, then my firm conviction is that the music will not be so either, nor the whole satisfy the pretensions that I must make in executing such a work, though they may indeed entirely differ from those usually made, and from the demands of the public. But I have long since given up all idea of conforming to public tastes, simply for the reason that it is impossible; so I must follow the dictates of my own conscience now as ever. . . . I would rather never compose an opera at all than one which from the commencement I considered only indifferent; moreover, I could not possibly compose such an one were you to give me the whole kingdom of Prussia to do so. All this, and the many annoyances certain to occur after the completion of a text, if I should not feel disposed to undertake it, render it my duty to proceed step by step, and rather to move too slowly than too hastily. On this account I have resolved, unless we first agree about the scenarium, never to beguile any poet into undertaking a laborious work which may after all prove vain. The scenarium may be prolix or brief, detailed or merely sketched—on these points I do not presume to dictate; and quite as little whether the opera should be in three, four, or five acts; if it be really good then eight acts would not be too many for me, nor one too few, and I say the same as to a ballet or no ballet. The only question is whether it harmonises or not with the musical and other existing feelings of my nature; and I believe that I am able to discern this quite as well from the scenarium as from the finished text, and that is, moreover, a point which no one can decide save myself." Explanatory comment upon these remarks would be like a candle held to the moon. We see through them, with all-sufficient clearness, the conscientious artist who could no more violate his musical principles than desecrate the altars of his faith.

In the letters of this period we get an equally satisfactory, and more curious, glimpse of our composer: "I have to-day made a resolution in which I heartily rejoice and that is, never again to take any part as judge of the prizes at a musical competition. Several proposals of this kind were made to me, and I did not know why I should be so annoyed by them, till I clearly saw that it was, in fact, a display of arrogance on my part, to which I would not myself submit from others, and should therefore carefully avoid setting myself up as a proficient, and my taste as incontrovertible, and in an idle hour passing in review all the poor competitors, criticising them, and, God knows, possibly being guilty of the most glaring injustice towards them. So, I resolved once for all to renounce the office, and feel quite relieved by having done so." Yet another glimpse is supplied at this period of the correspondence, only now we see the master in a wholly different aspect. During 1840 the public mind of Germany, as often before and since, was much excited against France, and the usual crop of patriotic songs at once began to grow and flourish. Among others moved to court the poetic muse on behalf of Fatherland, was a certain

Herr von Zucalmaglio. This person wrote a number of verses in the spirit of our late national anthem, "We don't want to fight," and forwarded them to Mendelssohn for music. The master refers to these as follows: "When you see Herr v. Zucalmaglio, thank him for his packet and the letter I received from him; at the same time (though this is quite between ourselves) I cannot compose music for the songs he sent me. They are patriotic; at this moment I have no taste whatever for such a style of song—they might cause a great deal of misapprehension; and in the present state of things people seem to me to begin to sing against the French at the very moment when they must know the French will not fight them. For such a purpose I have no music." The master felt deeply and consistently about jingoism in music. Thus we find him writing soon after to Klingemann: "The whole town here is ringing with a song, supposed to have a political tendency against the French, and the journals are striving with all their might to make it popular. In the present dearth of public topics they succeed in this without any difficulty, and every one is speaking of the 'Rheinlied,' or 'Cologneaise' as they significantly call it. The thing is characteristic, for the first line runs: 'Sie sollen ihn nicht haben, den freien Deutschen Rhein' and at the commencement of each verse is repeated, 'Never shall they have it,' as if this were saying anything at all. If this were at least changed into 'We mean to keep it'—but 'Never shall they have it' seems to me so sterile and futile. There is certainly something very boyish in this idea, for when I actually possess an object, and hold it sure and fast, it is quite superfluous to sing or say that it shall belong to no one else. This song is now sung at Court in Berlin, and in the clubs and casinos here, and of course the musicians pounce upon it like mad, and are immortalising themselves by setting it. The Leipzig composers have brought out no fewer than three melodies for it, and every day the papers make some allusion to it. Yesterday, amongst other things, they said I had also set the song, whereas I never even dreamt of meddling with such merely defensive enthusiasm. So the people here lie like print, just as they do with you, and everywhere else." In another letter the master again refers to this Rheinlied nuisance: "You can have no idea of the fuss they make about it here, and how utterly repugnant to me this newspaper enthusiasm is. To make such a piece of work about a song, the chief burden of which is that others shall not deprive us of what we have got—truly this is worthy of such a commotion and such music. I never wish to hear a single note of it sung when the refrain is always not to give up what you possess. Young lads and timid men may make this outcry, but true men make no such piece of work about what is their own; they have it, and that suffices. I felt provoked to see recently in a newspaper that, besides four compositions on these sublime words which have been produced in Leipzig, one by me had just appeared, and my name was printed, full length; yet I cannot give a direct contradiction to this, for, as regards the public, I am dumb. At the same time Härtel sent me a message that if I would compose for it he would undertake to sell six thousand copies in two months. No, Paul; I won't do it."

At this point begins the correspondence which subsequently led to Mendelssohn's removal from Leipzig to Berlin. As, however, the letters are numerous and important, we must, for the present, reserve their consideration, and pass on to see the master not only criticising another man's work, but expressing himself on the very form of music in which he particularly excelled, and which has become almost identified with his name. An anonymous composer having sent an overture written in light and fantastic style to Mendelssohn, elicited a reply eminently worthy of reflection. The master said, "If I were to find any fault, it would be one with which I have often reproached myself in my own works; in the very overtures you allude to, sometimes in a greater and sometimes in a lesser degree. It is often very difficult, in such fantastical airy subjects, to hit the right medium. If you grasp it too firmly it is apt to become formal and prosaic; and if too delicately, it dissolves into air and play of sound, and does not become a defined form. This last rock you seem to have split upon; in many passages, especially at the very beginning, but also here and there in other parts, and towards the close again, I feel the want of a musical well-defined form, the outlines of which I can recognise, however misty, and grasp and enjoy. I should like, besides the Meno allegro, to see some other more definite idea, and to have it differently worked out; only then, the other rock is too apt to show itself, and the Thema appear where there should be nothing but moonlight. In order, however, to give free course to these poetical thoughts, the spirit of entire mastery must hover over the whole (that fact should not become too dry, nor fancy too misty); and it is only where this complete mastery over thought and arrangement exists that the reins may be given to imagination. This is the very thing which we are all obliged, more or less, to digest. I hope you will not be offended, therefore, that I do not find this problem entirely solved in your work either; in your future productions, with which I hope to become acquainted, the connection will, no doubt, be closer, and my critical remarks rendered unnecessary."

It is to be hoped Herr X. did not show this valuable letter to his brother musicians, otherwise the master must have been inundated with compositions in hope of obtaining a like return.

After all this serious business we may as well temporarily part from Mendelssohn when he is in a funny mood. His sister Fanny, with whom he was never tired of joking, wrote to ask about the tempi in one of his Psalms, and had for answer the following: "As to the tempi in my Psalm, all I have to say is, that the passage of the Jordan must be kept very watery; it would have a good effect if the chorus were to reel to and fro, that people might think they saw the waves. Here we have achieved this effect. If you do not know how to take the other tempi wrong, ask G—— about them. He understands that capitally in my Psalms. With submission, allow me to suggest that the last movement be taken very slow indeed, as it is called 'Sing to the Lord for ever and ever,' and ought therefore to last for a very long time! Forgive this dreadful joke."

CHOPIN AND GEORGE SAND.

By an Oxonian.

THE recently published translation of M. Karasowski's "Life and Letters of Chopin" will stimulate English interest in one who holds a unique place among musical composers. Grateful as we are for M. Karasowski's work, we deeply regret that its historic value should be impaired by the subjective bias of the author. Chopin's eight years' intimacy with George Sand is, for anyone who would understand him truly, perhaps the most significant thing about him. M. Karasowski hates George Sand, and his account of the part she played in Chopin's life seems to us at variance with all the facts in our possession. Opinions on so delicate a matter as personal relationship are of little value save when founded on a just estimate of personal character. Failing to form any such estimate, M. Karasowski has drawn a picture which is unworthy of George Sand and unworthy of Chopin. A cloud of misrepresentation darkens a noble friendship. It will be our purpose to dispel the cloud that the light may shine.

M. Karasowski places his readers at his own standpoint without delay. Here is our introduction to George Sand. We read (p. 258) how Chopin, "finding that his hopes of an ideal union were shattered, to wipe out and forget the insult he had received, threw himself into the arms of a woman who exercised a very pernicious influence over him." One word as to this influence before passing on. Let those, who can, conceive Chopin changed for the better. We, who love him too well to wish him otherwise, gratefully remember that George Sand had a lion's share in making him what he is. A recent author informs us that a good strong assertion becomes a powerful argument, since few readers have the means of verifying its correctness. To this kind of argument M. Karasowski is no stranger. "George Sand," he says (p. 261), "was passionately enamoured of Chopin." George Sand was not enamoured of Chopin. We have her own word for it, and her word is final. Let us say at once that George Sand's sincerity is above question. Envy and calumny and hate have had plenty to say about her, but those who have met her face to face know her to be one of the chosen few in whose presence the soul kneels. We must, therefore, reject M. Karasowski's assertion (p. 302) that she attracted Chopin "by the intensity of her love." The raison d'être of the attraction is not hard to find. Chopin had an artist's hunger for sympathy, and George Sand, woman and poet, understood him as he understood himself. The depth of his love for her adds one more to the many proofs that love inspired by sympathy is the deepest of all.

About the memorable visit to Majorca, M. Karasowski tells us (p. 265) that George Sand "pressed Chopin to go with her," that Chopin "could not say 'no' to a woman whom he so revered," and that "his friends did not think this journey at all advisable." The fact is that George Sand had made up her mind to winter in the South, for the benefit of her son Maurice. As she prepared for departure, Chopin said to her several times that were he in Maurice's place he would soon be cured. His friends thought him consumptive; they had long wished him to try the effect of a milder climate, and they knew that he would never leave Paris unless drawn away by some one of whom he was fond, and who was fond of him. They accordingly urged George Sand not to discourage the desire which he now so opportunely and so unexpectedly expressed ("Histoire de ma vie," iv., 435-6). George Sand had a keen affection for Chopin's disposition, compassion for his suffering, adoration for his genius. She took him not in place of, but along with her son, and nursed him with maternal solicitude. After this journey came the visit to Nohant, and, as a result of both, Chopin began to find George Sand a necessity to him. Many considerations made the adoption of Chopin into her family a serious question to George Sand. First and foremost came the health and education of her children, who were now the chief interest of her life. After reflection she undertook the charge. "An additional duty in my life," she says, "already so absorbed and overladen with toil, seemed to me an additional chance for the austerity to which I felt myself drawn with a kind of religious enthusiasm." ("Histoire de ma vie," iv., 455.)

Disinterested devotion appeals in vain to M. Karasowski. He has a parti pris, and he presently startles us with an allusion to Madame de Warens (p. 304) which throws an instructive but unfortunate light upon his general conception of the intimacy between Chopin and George Sand. We are not now surprised to hear (p. 302) that Chopin had "felt some scruples about his illegitimate union,"—that (p. 303) "his moral sense told him he ought to atone for the wrong he had done in taking this woman unlawfully to himself"—that (p. 327) "knowing the strict moral principles of his parents he preferred to keep secret his liaison with George Sand." "Conjectures are dangerous things," says Mr. Matthew Arnold, "but they form themselves and visit us whether one will or no." And this "Madame de Warens" view of the case leads irresistibly to the conjecture that M. Karasowski's story from first to last rests upon no more secure foundation than Paris gossip. Our suspicion is wondrously confirmed when we find (p. 306) in Chopin's mouth reflections against exposing "to the blame, nay, even to the scorn of the strictly virtuous," the woman whom, as Liszt says, he loved even to death. The ring of this "strictly virtuous" recalls Carlyle's story of the man who vilified the sun because it would not light his cigar. The conventional world no doubt saw terrible things in Chopin's association with George Sand, whom they treated as they are wont to treat the apostles of new faith. Prisoned in the letter that kills, and blind to the spirit that gives life, they credited her with no principles because she disowned theirs. The kind of intimacy which M. Karasowski presupposes, even had it been possible for Chopin, was not possible to George Sand. We must love with our whole being, she maintained, or live, come what may, in virgin purity. Union on any other terms is a mortal sin. And, with her, to preach and to practise were the same thing. God, she said, may acquit those who err through ignorance, but not so those who know the ideal and who trample it under foot. We may be satisfied that Chopin was not ashamed of his intimacy with a noble woman, since he had nothing to be ashamed of. "He never suffered me to fall in his esteem," writes George Sand.

M. Karasowski's colouring is of course largely due to his easy-going acceptance of the opinion that George Sand's romance, "Lucrezia Floriani," describes her relations with Chopin. Owing to certain fancied resemblances such as the world has a pardonable eagerness to trace, an opinion gained ground at the time of publication that Le Prince Karol was an intended portrait of Chopin. Liszt shared the error, and at a later period even Chopin himself. This gave pain to George Sand. She had previously suffered from the system of identification when the critics confused her husband with M. Delmare. "It is really too easy," she wrote, "to compose the biography of a novelist by transferring the fictions of her stories into the reality of her existence. Imagination does not cost much." M. Karasowski tells us (p. 305) that she "excused herself" for the publication of "Lucrezia Floriani." "Excused" is the wrong word. She corrected the general misapprehension. "This story," she said, "was not a bit like ours. It was altogether the reverse" ("Histoire de ma vie," iv., 468). We need hardly add that Count Stanisla Tarnowski's remark (p. 303) about "an heroic expedient" has not the remotest foundation in fact.

Of the final separation, M. Karasowski writes (p. 307): "In the beginning of 1847, during a violent scene of which her daughter was the innocent cause, George Sand brought about a complete rupture." The fact is that Maurice Sand, now in his twenty-fourth year, found Chopin such a trial to his temper that he spoke of leaving the home. Chopin's extreme nervous development, characteristic of musicians, made him extraordinarily sensitive; he was devoured by dreams of an ideal which rendered him intolerant of all reality, and his health was deplorable. He was therefore worthy of all forbearance. But if we remember how full of bitterness was George Sand's life at this period, if we remember that her son was her chief consolation, we shall not wonder that she interfered. It was a right purchased by eight years of maternal devotion. Chopin could not brook the interference. He loved too well. "Never," says George Sand, "had a reproach passed between us save once only, alas! the first time and the last. So lofty an affection must needs break, rather than wear itself out in unworthy altercations." ("Histoire de ma vie," iv., 469.) Few pictures in biography are more inexpressibly touching than this of the frail artist, with death in his heart, proudly turning his back upon all that made life possible to him. Chopin is grand in his despair.

M. Karasowski's last touch is in harmony with the whole (p. 307). The "Histoire de ma vie" is the best proof of George Sand's feeling towards the "pure and beautiful soul, born to sickness and suffering in this world," who was her "guest during the last eight years of her life of retirement at Nohant under the Monarchy." We have there a portrait of Chopin worthy of the author of "Consuelo," and we feel that it tells us more of our musician, as he really was, than anything and everything else which has been written about him. It is a chef d'œuvre. One word more. M. Karasowski has told us (p. 264), that George Sand "empoisoned" Chopin's later life. Franz Liszt thinks differently, as readers of the "Vie de Chopin" will remember. "Happy, even in the hour of anguish, he to whom God has given a soul worthy of love and of sorrow," writes Victor Hugo. And those who have not our faith in Victor Hugo's paradox, must admit that without the love and the sorrow Chopin would have given us very different music. Many years ago Mr. Frederic Myers expressed the genius of Orpheus in one exquisite line: "He wept his soul in song." Let this be our last thought of Chopin.

[Note.—The works referred to in the preceding article are "Frederic Chopin: His Life, Letters, and Works," translated by E. Hill, from the German of Moritz Karasowski. William Reeves, London, 1879. "Histoire de ma vie." Par George Sand. Calmann Lévy, Paris, 1876.]

Under the heading of "Music at Lambeth Potteries," a morning contemporary publishes a long account of a concert given to the workmen engaged at Messrs. Doulton's establishment, about 700 persons, representing the various degrees of mechanical skill required in the ceramic work there carried on, being assembled. Having given concerts at low prices to the poorer classes in various parts of London, it occurred to Mr. Bethune, the Director of the recently-formed "Society for the Entertainment of the People," that it would further the cause if some of the great employers of labour in the metropolis would give a free performance to their workpeople; and this idea being warmly responded to by Messrs. Doulton, in the huge workshop, properly warmed and lighted for the occasion, this interesting gathering took place. We have already made some remarks in these columns upon the kind of compositions which should be chosen for "People's Concerts," and are glad to find that those who have the direction of the Society above mentioned are beginning to understand that even popular audiences cannot all be treated alike. For instance, we are told that "in a Westminster slum, or in a school-room on Snow Hill there is an evident desire to 'guy' the performance at the first opportunity," and that "a titter is always ready at the slightest hitch." Apart from this, the instrumental music must not be of too elevated a character, and the songs must be in consonance with the limited sympathies of the auditors. On the contrary, an assemblage of orderly working men will even accept with pleasure music far above their comprehension, as an instance of which we may mention that the concert above referred to commenced with a Quintet by Mozart, and that the programme included a piece by Chopin, and excellent songs rendered by well-known vocalists, Signor Randegger presiding at the pianoforte. Whilst admitting, then, that the lower classes must be led, and not driven, to the enjoyment of the best music, let it be understood that it is no more necessary to give them bad compositions than to feed infants upon unwholesome food, because it is not of the kind upon which they will thrive in after years. Experience only can teach these truths, and it is gratifying to find that the "Society for the Entertainment of the People" is gradually taking this lesson to heart.

Several correspondents have recently asked us to furnish particulars respecting the life of Hermann Goetz, and we wish it were possible to gratify them to the fullest extent. Anything like a satisfactory record of the lamented young composer's too short career has however yet to be written, necessarily by some one who was either a personal friend, or who now has access to peculiar sources of information. The main facts of Goetz's uneventful life are understood to be correctly given in M. Arthur Pougin's supplement to Fétis's "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," and these we now transcribe for the benefit of our querists. Hermann Goetz was born at Königsberg, December 7, 1840, and began his serious musical study at a later period than usual with those who are destined composers. His first master was Kœhler; but on entering the Stern School at Berlin he was placed under Von Bülow and Ulrich. At the age of twenty-three he obtained a place as organist at Winterthur, and not long after removed thence to Zurich, where, in a similar capacity, and as teacher of the pianoforte, he remained during the rest of his life. The time not spent in earning a living was devoted to serious composition, and several of his instrumental works were publicly performed before the production of an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," at Mannheim (October 11, 1874), made him famous. Subsequently Goetz composed a Symphony in F, and had written all but the last act of a second opera ("Francesca di Rimini") when he died of consumption at Hottingen, December 3, 1876, having nearly attained the fatal age of thirty-six. The unfinished opera was completed by Frank from sketches left by Goetz, and has since been published, together with several works of interest and value which the composer himself had not, through want of opportunity or other reason, given to the world. Among these are Psalm cxxxvii., "By the Waters of Babylon," "Nœnia," the Symphony, and the Pianoforte Quintet in C minor.

On many occasions we have called attention to the variations in the several editions of standard works, and pointed out the difficulties which many amateurs experience in determining how certain passages should be played. One of Beethoven's Sonatas, for example, has lately come before us in which the composer's harmonies have been boldly altered; and we could also adduce an instance in a well known piece where the rhythm has been temporarily changed, to accommodate what has been presumed by the editor to be a superfluous note in one bar. Some alterations which come strangely upon those who have been trained upon the traditional method of rendering these passages may of course be engraver's errors, but those we have mentioned must assuredly be new readings. Glaring as are these instances of tampering with the compositions of the great masters, we should not have recurred to the subject but for an example of its effect upon the auditors of a classical concert during the past month. Much has been said about the educational effect of the "Analytical Programmes" now supplied to the audience at high-class concerts, the hearers being thus enabled to follow the principal themes of each composition; yet we cannot but think that when—as was the case at the performance referred to—the leading subject is printed in the book in one way, and the pianist plays it in another, a student, so far from gaining any knowledge on the subject, must be thrown into a state of inextricable confusion. We do not wish here to discuss which reading is the more correct—no doubt the author of the book and the pianist could supply us with very good reasons for their disagreement—but we do think that the writer of an "Analytical Programme" should be duly informed by the executant of the works therein named which edition she favours.

Every encouragement should be given to those few self-denying individuals who devote themselves to further art for art's sake alone. We have often referred to the announcements of musical professors—of whom nobody before had ever heard—in which they proclaim their ability and readiness to teach for a few shillings, and in an incredibly short space of time, that which would be comparatively expensive and laborious if studied under those who have made a name before the public. And now we read the advertisement of a benevolent musical instrument maker, who tells us that he is "determined to help the ever-increasing love of music by offering a splendid celestial-toned concertina, melodious and rich, at the price usually charged for a concertina that is merely a child's toy." Without stopping to inquire whether any person besides the maker has pronounced this instrument to be "celestial-toned," we cannot but tender our thanks to the advertiser, who by telling us that the concertina will be "despatched upon receipt of P.O.O., payable at the G.P.O.," and that "no coupon or other humbug is required," is evidently desirous that everybody musically inclined shall benefit by his generosity. But respecting the time it would take to play upon this instrument we are left somewhat in doubt. He certainly says, "Send early, and be able to play by Christmas;" but as the paper in which we read this advertisement is dated "December 28," we presume that he must mean by next Christmas. We should also be inclined to ask why, if these instruments are expected to be "sold in thousands" at 7s. 6d., the "retail price" should be 15s.? Would it not "help the ever-increasing love of music" to fix the price which is not to be paid at a higher mark—say a guinea?

Anybody desirous of devoting himself earnestly to music, either as a profession or a mere accomplishment, can have no difficulty in the present day in finding an "Academy" or, if he prefers it, a "Conservatoire" at which to enter himself. In the olden times professors of the highest standing, in addition to giving lessons at private houses, used to receive pupils at their own residence, some being employed in the only recognised musical institution of the day—the Royal Academy of Music. Now, however, houses are converted into "Academies," the resident professor being the "Principal"; and no student is admitted without undergoing an "examination" as to his or her qualifications. When therefore we hear pupils boast that they are from "the Academy," we really cannot tell where they have received their education; and indeed we may even say that they often scarcely know themselves. Of course there can be no possible reason why a professor should not turn his house into a musical institution, over which he may reign supreme, and engage professors to teach the various branches of music; but what we particularly desire is that the public should fully understand that these are merely the private speculations of individuals, and not representative bodies, like the Royal Academy of Music and the National Training School. We have every respect for the manner in which many of the colleges referred to are conducted; but it is absolutely necessary that a line should be drawn between an Academy which elects its own Principal, and one in which the Principal elects himself.

Examples are not unknown of distinguished men amusing themselves by gathering together under one cover, or, in cases of great eminence, several covers, all the abuse that has been flung at them through the press. The occupation, probably, has its uses and its charms. It may prove corrective of a tendency to undue inflation (it may at the same time act in a precisely opposite way); it would without doubt reduce an exalted idea of average human nature to the level of truth, and, in each instance, place on record the wonderful ingenuity of the vituperative mind. It is to be hoped that Richard Wagner, or one of his faithful disciples for him, is doing this thing in the intervals of severer labour. If so, the result cannot fail to prove both curious and astonishing, since no one more than the poet-composer of Bayreuth has been a mark for the species of missile he himself knows so well how to fling. Meanwhile, an idea of the wealth of such a collection may be gathered from the pages of our French contemporary, L'Art Musical. Whenever reference is made in them to Wagner a new epithet starts up, and it might long ago have been supposed that the writer had exhausted his vocabulary. But he still goes cheerfully on, and is even prodigal of "hard words," as though the stock were large as ever. Thus, in a recent paragraph a few lines long, Wagner was called, with reckless extravagance, "Son Irréfragabilité," "Sa Myosotabilité," and "Sa Gallophobilité." We are curious to see what terms remain behind for future use.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The season of Opera in the language of our country was inaugurated at Her Majesty's Theatre on the 10th ult., and with every prospect of that continued success which has hitherto attended Mr. Carl Rosa's laudable efforts to convince us of the perfect adaptability of English words to the lyrical drama. Wagner's "Rienzi" (produced by this company last season) was the Opera chosen for the occasion, and introduced to us Herr Schott, from Hanover, in the principal character. Unquestionably the high qualifications of this artist as an actor partially compensate for many of those vocal defects observable even when he made his début in the concert-room at Herr von Bülow's Recitals last year. His powerful voice is scarcely under that control essential for the due rendering of those cantabile phrases which so decisively test the singer's art, and his intonation is often extremely defective; but, by his noble bearing and well-trained dramatic action, he won his way with the audience, and may doubtless be heard to greater advantage in other parts during the season. In the character of Irene, Mdlle. Lido, who made her first appearance on the English stage, created an impression of the most favourable kind; and the same may be said of Miss Annetta Albu, who, in the very small part of the Messenger of Peace, sang with a refinement and certainty of intonation which augurs well for her future career. Miss Josephine Yorke materially enhanced her reputation by her excellent singing and acting as Adriano; and the other principals and chorus exerted themselves with such success as to realise, on the whole, one of the best performances of "Rienzi" yet given by this company. The production of M. Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" (the English version by Mr. Arthur Matthison) is likely to prove one of the principal attractions of the season: Miss Julia Gaylord, who enacts the heroine, giving us so perfect a representation of this interesting part as effectually to enlist the sympathies of her hearers. Indeed, we scarcely know whether to award the greater amount of praise to her singing or her acting, so thoroughly and truthfully has she studied every portion of the character, both histrionically and vocally. Miss Georgina Burns, too, was highly satisfactory in the showy music allotted to Filina; Madame Dolaro was fairly good as Frederick; Mr. Joseph Maas elicited well-deserved applause throughout the somewhat arduous part of Wilhelm—both his voice and style evidencing that marked improvement which can only be acquired by stage experience—and the subordinate parts (especially that of Laertes, the actor, most amusingly played by Mr. Charles Lyall) were everything that could be desired.

Hermann Goetz's Opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," produced on the 20th ult., makes us regret that (as in the case of Bizet's "Carmen") the early decease of its composer should have robbed the world of one who, both in this and the now published Opera, "Francesca di Rimini," has conjured up such bright hopes of future excellence. Although performed last year at Drury Lane Theatre, Mr. Carl Rosa may be said to have introduced the Opera for the first time to an English audience; for on the occasion referred to the execution of the work was scarcely good enough to direct attention to its merits. At Her Majesty's Theatre, however, every attention has been paid to the minutest details, and there can be but little doubt that it will now take a high place amongst the modern contributions to the lyrical stage. Considering that an adaptation—or "arrangement" rather —from the original "Taming of the Shrew" was made in German for musical purposes, and that this had afterwards to be translated into English, it can scarcely be expected that much of Shakespeare is left in the present version; but the difficult task of rendering the words into our native tongue, whilst sympathising throughout with the music, has been excellently performed by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, who on many similar occasions has proved his fitness for such an undertaking. Although many characters are very wisely omitted, and others made but little of, the spirit, at least, of the well-known scenes with Katharine and Petruchio has been carefully preserved; and in the construction of the book ample opportunity has been given for varied and effective musical illustration. Hermann Goetz was no frivolous worker in his art. Earnestness of purpose is apparent throughout his setting of this libretto; and if occasionally this earnestness leads him to think out his music apart from the situation it should colour, the motive which prompts it may be pleaded in partial extenuation of the fault. Melody prevails throughout the Opera, but scarcely of a kind which can be borne away to our homes. Popular, therefore, the work may never be; but its claim to be accepted as the conscientious production of an artist rich in natural gifts will at once be admitted by musicians. The orchestration throughout is not only remarkable for variety of colour, but so skilfully woven in with every vocal phrase as to form an integral portion of the composition. It is the fashion now to say that Wagner and Gounod (certainly two of the greatest musical thinkers of the day) have formed the style of most of our modern composers; and we see that even Goetz has not escaped this imputation; but, except inasmuch as every artist is, and should be, influenced by the existing art of his time, we cannot see any imitation of either of these composers in the music of the "Taming of the Shrew." The great objection that we find in the composer's treatment of the text is the want of contrast in the music assigned to the various characters, the concerted pieces, especially—full of melodic phrases and admirably constructed—often moving onwards as if they were played by instruments, instead of being uttered by voices. This, of course, detracts from the dramatic interest in many places; and some of the most artistic numbers, therefore, engage the attention of the few rather than the many. Space would not permit of our citing the names of even the best amongst the several good pieces in the Opera; but we may mention the Overture —which although scarcely applicable to a comic Opera, is well constructed and finely instrumented—the opening Serenade with the following Chorus; Katharine's song, "I'll give myself to no one" (encored); the finale to the second act; the whole of the music in the lesson scene—especially that portion in which the notes of the scale are made to fall upon the corresponding letters—the bustling music of the "taming" scene, which is, perhaps the most appropriate in the Opera; and the charming song of Katharine in the last act, written especially for Miss Hauk by the composer only a few days before his death. Of the general execution of the work we must speak in the highest terms of praise. Miss Minnie Hauk was just the Katharine that Shakespeare must have imagined; and when we also say that she thoroughly fulfilled every demand made by the composer upon her vocal powers, it may be imagined that she created a success equal, if not superior, to her Carmen. Not only the shrewish portion of the character was excellently acted, but those subtle and varied phases of the part, too often passed over by mere ambitious vocalists, were so faithfully realised as to make the entire performance one of remarkable and exceptional merit. Mr. Walter Bolton, both in his singing and acting as Petruchio, created a highly favourable impression upon the audience; Miss Burns sang the music of Bianca with much intelligence, especially in the lesson scene; Mr. Packard was exceedingly good as Lucentio, Mr. Snazelle made an excellent Baptista, Mr. C. Lyall was irresistibly comic as the Tailor, receiving Petruchio's kicks with obsequious civility, and Mr. Leslie Crotty (Hortensio) and Mr. T. Law (Grumio) gave much effect to all the music allotted to them. The chorus was admirable throughout; and Signor Randegger (who, in consequence of Mr. Carl Rosa's indisposition, has hitherto assumed the post of Conductor, occasionally assisted by Mr. John Pew) directed the Opera with much skill and judgment.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

A large audience assembled at the Royal Albert Hall on the 22nd ult. to listen to the performance by the above Society of two works of a religious character which it is extremely interesting to place in juxtaposition—viz., Verdi's "Requiem" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The two conveniently occupy the time allotted to an evening performance, while affording an opportunity to the amateur of comparing the styles of two modern composers, of whom the one may be said to have been the founder of the Italian romantic school, and the other to be its present most gifted representative. There is no need now to enter again into the relative merits of these two compositions, each remarkable in its way, this having been repeatedly done on previous occasions. We may say at once that the performance we speak of was, both as regards chorus and orchestra, a highly satisfactory one, fully sustaining the high standard which, under the leadership of Mr. Barnby, this Society has attained.

The solo portions in both works were distributed between Misses Anna Williams and De Fonblanque, Mr. E. Lloyd and Herr Henschel. Among special effects produced in the "Requiem" may be instanced the "Recordare," well rendered by the two ladies, the "Ingemisco" for tenor solo, and the grand "Sanctus" for the full choir. In the "Stabat" Mr. Lloyd created quite a furore by his fine singing of the "Cujus animam," one of the most popularly known numbers of Rossini's work, the other solo vocalists named acquitting themselves likewise in a most efficient manner. Mr. Barnby conducted with his usual care and precision, Dr. Stainer presiding at the organ. The "Messiah" will be performed at the Society's next concert, on the 11th inst.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

We have still briefly to refer to the concluding Concert of last year (Dec. 22), of which we were only able to cite the programme, as previously announced, some changes having taken place in the latter as regards the solo pieces actually performed. These were Chopin's Ballade in G minor, rendered by Mdlle. Janotha in the true vein of the composer of universal grief ("Weltschmerz," as the Germans of the Heine period would have said), and of course "encored"; and Beethoven's oft-heard, and, let us hope, oft-to-be-repeated, Romance in F major for violin (Op. 50), played with exquisite feeling and grace by Madame Norman-Néruda, accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Zerbini, who delivered himself of his important part in an efficient, though somewhat matter-of-fact manner. Vocal soli by Handel and Henry Smart were well rendered by Mr. Frederick King.

A prominent feature of interest in the programme of the opening Concert of the new year (the 5th ult.) was the introduction, for the first time in public, of a posthumous Quartet in E flat for stringed instruments, by Mendelssohn. Whatever may be said of the propriety of reviving an early work, deliberately withheld from publication by its eminently self-criticising composer, there can be no doubt that in the present instance his reputation can only be enhanced by the disclosure. Not that the quartet in question, composed by a child of fourteen, represents, as yet, the individual Mendelssohn, such as we know and love him. It is the work of an artist still feeling his way amidst the powerful impressions received from the works of Haydn, Mozart, Weber, and Beethoven; while every now and then honest old Zelter's face looks at us through the music full of pride and satisfaction in his precocious pupil. Nevertheless, the quartet, as a whole, is a masterpiece of the particular form to which it belongs, and any one knowingly listening to it as the work of a beginner must feel that the next step of its composer will be the complete emancipation of his own individuality. The quartet opens with a vivacious and well sustained Allegro, followed by an Adagio which in its broad melodiousness offers frequent opportunities to the first violin for the display of cantabile style. The Minuetto, which succeeds, is trivial, and indeed scarcely in keeping with the dignity of the rest of the movements, whereas in the finale the boy of fourteen evidences so perfect a mastery over the intricacies of the fugue, of which the movement consists, that we are inclined to agree with those who hold that certain few individuals may claim the acquisition of form in their particular art as their birthright. The quartet was played—or in operatic language "created," this being the first occasion of its performance—by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. The instrumental solo performances were Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor, admirably played by Mdlle. Janotha, and Mendelssohn's Tema con Variazioni, for pianoforte and violoncello, in which the lady just mentioned was associated with Signor Piatti, the latter being distinguished during the evening by special plaudits, signifying the satisfaction of the audience at the reappearance of this eminent artist at these Concerts after his recent indisposition. Herr Henschel was the vocalist on this occasion, and gave with much effect songs by Schumann and Brahms, accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Zerbini. Haydn's Quartet in C major (Op. 33, No. 3) concluded the interesting programme, the executants being the same as those who took part in the previous quartet.

At the second Concert (given on the 12th ult.) Signor Piatti introduced, for the first time here, a Sonata in E major (Op. 8) by Giuseppe Valentini, an Italian composer who flourished in the first half of the past century, but of whose numerous compositions, chiefly for stringed instruments, very few are now extant. The Sonata, for the resuscitation of which musical amateurs are indebted to Signor Piatti, is said to have been written for the violin or the violoncello ad libitum, and is, indeed, well suited to either instrument. We confess, however, that apart from the historical interest attaching to it, and the admirable rendering it received at the hands of so consummate an artist, we were not greatly impressed with either the depth of thought or the originality of treatment displayed in the composition in question, exception being made in the largo, which is full of melodiousness, and includes some very interesting effects. Signor Piatti, who surmounted the numerous intricate difficulties involved in the performance of the Sonata with the ease and grace to which he has long accustomed us, had also skilfully supplied the pianoforte accompaniment, founded upon the figured bass merely indicated (according to the practice of the time) in the original. Mdlle. Janotha again presided at the pianoforte, and was greatly and deservedly applauded in her rendering of Beethoven's "Thirty-two Variations on an Original Air," in C minor. Miss Damian, a young lady possessing a genuine contralto voice and some good schooling, made her début here on this occasion, and met with a very encouraging reception in her delivery of Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn" and Schubert's "To the Lyre." The Concert opened with Schubert's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 29), and concluded with Haydn's Quartet in D minor (Op. 42), the latter being one of the two works of this kind by the fertile composer which were introduced for the first time at these Concerts at the beginning of the present season. The artists associated in the rendering of the Quartets named were Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti.

On the third evening of the month (the 19th ult.) the Concert was inaugurated by a fine performance of Beethoven's String Quartet in F minor (No. 11 of Op. 95), a work emanating from the second of the composer's three recognised periods of artistic development, and one most characteristic of his unique individuality. Frequenters of these Concerts are already familiar with the manifold beauties of this quartet, of which the present was the tenth performance. The executants were Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Instrumental soli were contributed by Mdlle. Janotha and Madame Norman-Néruda, the former playing, as at the previous Concert, a Ballade by Chopin (in A flat), and the eminent lady-violinist giving an admirable interpretation of a Sonata in D major (Op. 5, No. 1) by Corelli, himself one of the most remarkable violin players of his time (he was born in 1653), and equally important as a composer for the instrument. Mozart's Pianoforte Trio in B flat major, a composition characterised throughout by melodiousness and transparent clearness of construction, formed the concluding number in the programme, the performance, at the hands of Mdlle. Janotha, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti, leaving nothing to be desired. Mdlle. Anna Schauenburg was the vocalist, and in songs by Beethoven and Geyer displayed a fine alto voice of considerable range, her delivery being, however, wanting in artistic sympathy, a fact which may have been partly attributable to nervousness consequent upon a first appearance. M. Zerbini conducted.

The fourth and final Concert of the month (the 26th ult.) was rendered special by the fact of Dr. Hans von Bülow having been the pianist, he having already previously appeared, for the first time this season, at the Saturday afternoon Popular Concert of the 17th ult. On that occasion the versatile and in many respects unrivalled artist gave, as his solo performance, Bach's Suite Anglaise in D minor, one of six similar pieces composed by that master. Dr. von Bülow's special qualifications for the interpretation of Bach's music are well known, and were again displayed on the present occasion in such a manner as to elicit the most enthusiastic applause. Other numbers of the programme in the performance of which the great pianist took part were Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 97), and Schubert's Rondo in B minor (Op. 70), for pianoforte and violin, the part assigned to the latter instrument being finely rendered by Madame Norman-Néruda. At his second appearance, already referred to, Dr. von Bülow played Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), his interpretation being again characterised by the somewhat obtrusive individualism, of which we have already spoken on previous occasions, in connection with the artist's rendering of the music of the composer in question. Dr. von Bülow also played, in association with Signor Piatti, Beethoven's Sonata in G minor for pianoforte and violoncello, and, in conjunction with Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Zerbini and Piatti, Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38). It need scarcely be added that the reception accorded to the eminent pianist was again of the most enthusiastic kind.

The Concert opened with Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 20, No. 1), played here for the first time. Miss Aylward was the vocalist.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

If the Committee of this Society were possessed of a desire to indicate in the clearest manner the comprehensive nature of its operations, the programme of the Concert given in the Shoreditch Town Hall, on the 27th ult., was admirably qualified to fulfil that object. Of rarely performed works by the great masters there were Handel's "Utrecht Jubilate" and Beethoven's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; classical orchestral music was represented by Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony; and the modern German school by Schumann's "New Year's Song" and Brahms's Rhapsodie (Op. 53). In this list, every one of genuine musical feeling might have found something to suit his individual tastes. The "Utrecht Jubilate" of Handel was recently reviewed in these columns, and its merits need not again be discussed. The massive "Gloria" was performed at the Handel Festival of 1874, and more recently at a Sacred Harmonic Concert; but the work in its entirety has not been heard in public for many years. The thoughtful and unobtrusive additional accompaniments of Robert Franz were used at the Shoreditch Concert. The work was well, but not perfectly rendered, a lack of spirit characterising the performance. Ample amends were, however, made in the "New Year's Song," Mr. Prout's choir singing magnificently throughout this beautiful but far from easy work. Full justice was likewise rendered to the brief but sublime composition of Brahms, in which the genius of the German musician shines as clearly as in any of his larger works. Madame Enriquez sang the solo parts in this fragment with artistic earnestness, only needing a more sympathetic quality of voice to be entirely satisfactory. The other principal vocalists of the evening were Miss M. Jones, Mr. B. Davies, and Mr. F. Ward. Not the least enjoyable feature of the Concert was the playing of the orchestra in Spohr's Overture to "The Last Judgment," Auber's "Zanetta" Overture, and the Symphony. The final Saltarello in Mendelssohn's work was given with a vigour and spirit not easily to be equalled.

The production of a new comic Opera, by Messrs. W. S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan, entitled the "Pirates of Penzance," at the little town of Paignton, on the south coast of Devon, would assuredly excite our wonder were we not informed that, in the absence of the author and composer, a performance of the Opera in the metropolis is not deemed advisable, that Paignton is considered sufficiently out of the way to prevent the probability of many Londoners being included amongst the audience, and that a single representation of an English literary, dramatic, or musical work in any part of this country is absolutely necessary to secure for the authors a legal copyright. Our readers will, we are certain, be glad to know something of the merits of this latest production of our popular librettist and composer, and we therefore extract the following from the Paignton and Newton Directory of December 31 last:—

A new and original comic Opera by Messrs. W. S. Gilbert and A. Sullivan, entitled "The Pirates of Penzance, or Love and Duty," was produced at this theatre yesterday (Tuesday), and met with an enthusiastic reception. So far as we can judge from a first performance it bids fair to rival "H.M.S. Pinafore" in popularity. "The Pirates of Penzance" is in two acts and two set scenes—the first scene representing a cavern by the sea-shore, which stands throughout the entire act, and the second the ruins of a picturesque chapel by moonlight. The plot—a compound of whimsical absurdities—is well described as a satirical burlesque upon the conventional romance of buccaneering, and the sentimentalities of the pirates' career on the stage and in fiction. The hero, Frederick (Mr. Cadwalader), has been apprenticed, much against his inclinations, to the profession of a pirate, by mistake for that of a pilot, and when the curtain rises his articles are on the eve of expiring, and he is looking forward to his becoming an honest member of society, and an uncompromising foe to his former associates, simply from his predominant sense of duty. The only woman he has yet seen is his nurse Ruth (Miss Fanny Harrison), to whom, on her assurance that she was a fine woman years ago, and whose love for him has been accumulating forty-seven years, he pledges his faith conditionally, merely promising that if he finds she is really a fine woman her age shall be no obstacle to their union. However, he presently sees another woman more to his taste, in the person of Mabel (Miss Petrelli), one of the many daughters of the Major-General (Mr. R. Mansfield),—a most eccentric individual, somewhat after the pattern of the First Lord in "Pinafore"—who appears on the scene with her sisters. Of course, Frederick and Mabel fall in love at first sight, and the pirates severally claim the sisters as their brides. Their father comes in search of them, and, taking advantage of the pirates' sentimental respect for "orphans," whom they "often" meet with and never harm, himself claims to be an orphan, on which the pirates are moved to tears, and allow him and his interesting daughters to depart, accompanied by Frederick, who informs the pirates that his sense of duty will impel him to compass their destruction. On the rising of the curtain in the second act, the Major-General is discovered in the ruins of the chapel among the tombs of his ancestors "by purchase," lamenting the deception he has practised on the credulity of the pirates, and the dishonour he had brought on the family name of "Stanley." Then follows a scene between Frederick, Ruth, and the Pirate King, in which the nurse explains to Frederick that, as he was born on the 29th February, his articles would not expire until his 21st birthday, and, consequently, having only had some five birthdays, he has many more years to serve the pirates, and, his predominant sense of duty being appealed to, he reluctantly determines to rejoin the pirates. The Major-General confesses his falsehood, and a conflict takes place between the pirates and the authorities who arrive to capture them, and with some very effective concerted music the opera terminates. We are sorry that time does not permit of our giving more than the above meagre description of the story, which is exceedingly funny, and of the music we can speak in the highest praise. The airs are catching, and the concerted pieces are well worthy of our most popular English composer (Mr. Arthur Sullivan). We congratulate the talented author and composer on another brilliant success.

A correspondent of the Daily News gives a long account of the production of this Opera at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, New York, on the last night of the old year. "Author and composer," he says, "were repeatedly called before the curtain; nearly all the principal songs and choruses were demanded a second time, and the jokes are already in everybody's mouth."

The tenth Annual Literary and Musical Festival at Oswestry, which was held in the Powis Hall, on the 5th ult., was in the highest degree successful. Lord Newport made an excellent President of the morning meeting, and in the evening Mr. Leslie (who was accompanied by Mr. Barnby) delivered an eloquent address. In the course of his speech he said:

It is quite clear that music must become the most popular of the arts, because it is not given to every one by nature to paint a picture, but to almost every one a very little instruction to cultivate the voice, so that he or she may take part in the performance of the works of the great masters; and this must eventually carry music to the head of all the arts, and that which will be the greatest boon to a large part of the population of this kingdom. There is no question about the position music is taking in this district, because the results of the Musical Festival in September fully showed that what I have told you for three successive years I have proved by practice can be done, and a very fine performance it was, and most delightful to me, and satisfactory. I now throw out a challenge. I mean to say that I am ready to meet any choir from any town in England with a picked choir from this neighbourhood—(loud cheers)—and I only wish we could induce our friend Mr. Barnby to bring down some of his Albert Hall Choral Society. He would probably beat us, but that does not matter. That would show that we have something to learn. The result of my experience is that I never learnt anything by success, and all the experience I have earned has been by failure. That must be encouraging to a great many competing here. Now you know that the result of the Festival has been such that we have been able to start a school of Elementary Music, throwing wide our portals for the admission of every one who lives here and about here, at a very small expense to them, giving them the best tuition we have for miles around. When I tell you that the national and denominational schools are offered lessons for the children at one halfpenny per lesson, and that the working men and working women are offered the same at one penny per lesson, I do think that the cause of music ought to prosper, and that the art ought to rise and extend itself, to the advantage not only of the performance at the Festival, but of the whole life politic of the district. There is no doubt that there is a natural and national capacity for the art of music in this district such as is hardly to be beaten in the kingdom; and if only that system could be carried on which has been founded by the National Training School of Music, of having musical scholarships for counties, I have not a doubt that when we send up a musical member for Powys-land he will not be very far behind the foremost man in Great Britain.

Mr. Barnby, who was the adjudicator at both the morning and evening meetings, also made some interesting remarks upon the choral-singing exhibited at the Festival, earnestly exhorting the vocalists not to rest content with the progress they had already made, but to work with a will towards a higher stage of development. Much talent was evinced in many of the choral competitions, the principal being for the singing of Alfred Gaul's Part-song "The Silent Land" (prize of £7 7s. and a silver medal, awarded to the Oswestry Choir); for Farrant's anthem, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" (prize of £4 4s., awarded to the Zion Chapel Choir); another (in which three choirs competed), prize awarded to the Llanfyllin Choral Union; for the singing of "Hail, smiling morn," prize awarded to the Llanfyllin Glee Party; and another—prize of £5, given by Mr. Leslie, and £4 4s. worth of music added by Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co.—awarded to the same Party. There were also prizes for solo singing, and for a brass band contest, the latter of which—consisting of £5 5s. and a silver medal—was awarded to the Oswestry Volunteer Band, Conductor, Mr. Howes.

WE extract the following paragraph from The Times:—

The organ for the cathedral at Garden City, Long Island, now being made by Mr. Roosevelt, will, it is said, be the largest and most remarkable in the world. It will cost about 40,000 dollars, and will be put in place next spring. The exact number of speaking stops has not yet been determined, but it will likely be something near 120. (The organ in the Albert Hall, at present the largest, has 111, Boston Music Hall organ 84, the Cincinnati organ, 96, &c.) At the west end of the building, in a tower directly behind a large stained-glass window, is a room in which a part of the organ will be placed, and connected with the chancel by electricity. The window will be opened and closed by electricity, controlled by the organist from the chancel, thereby giving fine crescendo and diminuendo effects with the organ in the tower. Over the ceiling, about the centre of the building, will be placed another part of the instrument called the echo organ, which will also be played from the chancel by electricity. Underneath the chancel, in the chapel situated there, is another part of the organ which is arranged so that it can be played in the chapel as well as from the chancel. Lastly, the large chimes, which hang in the tower, will be connected with the chancel by electricity, so that the organist can play them from the keys of the organ. The bellows of the instrument will be worked by hydraulic engines, of which there will be five. The organist can, by simply turning on the water, have the whole instrument, including the chimes, at his command. Notwithstanding the great distance between the parts of this mammoth organ, the pressure necessary for the keys will be no greater than is used in playing on a piano. There will be four vox humanas,—one in the chancel, another in the tower, a third over the ceiling, and the fourth in the chapel below the chancel. All of these will be under the control of the organist in the chancel, and capable of crescendo and diminuendo effects. For the electric action of the organ, a small Gramme magneto-machine will be furnished. For the mechanical effects, as in ringing bells, &c., compressed air will be used in an ingenious manner devised by Mr. Roosevelt.

Without stopping to question the truth of the statement that this organ will be "the largest and most remarkable in the world," we cannot but be struck with the account of the multiplicity of tasks which will devolve upon the organist. The "large stained-glass window will be opened and closed by electricity, controlled by the organist from the chancel." Another part of the instrument, called the echo organ, placed over the ceiling, will also be played by electricity. The large chimes will be connected with the chancel by electricity, "so that the organist can play them from the keys of the organ"; and the organist, "by turning on the water" can have the whole instrument, including the chimes, at his command. Then the four vox humanas, placed in different parts of the building, will also be acted upon by the keys of the organ; and "mechanical effects" are to be produced by compressed air. Let us hope that if the organist has to undertake all these onerous duties, his attention will not be too much distracted by the necessity of also performing music.

ON the 15th ult. a Special Evening Service was held in Westminster Abbey, on which occasion a large selection from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" was rendered, under the able direction of Dr. Bridge. The Choir consisted of about fifty men and forty boys, the trebles of the Abbey Choir being augmented by the boys from St. Paul's Cathedral, and St. Peter's, Eaton Square. The orchestral accompaniments were played by a band of about forty performers, professional and amateur, conspicuous among whom were Mr. Ould (principal double-bass), Mr. Horton (oboe d'amore), and Dr. Stone (oboe da caccia). The ensemble was not, however, as efficient as might have been desired. The selection consisted of nearly the whole of Parts 1 to 4, the chorus, "Hear, King of angels" (No. 24), being repeated as a concluding chorus. The important bass solos were sung by Mr. Hilton, the fine air "Mighty Lord and King all glorious" (in which the trumpet obbligato was not altogether satisfactory), being very effectively given. Mr. Harper Kearton's fine voice was employed to great advantage in the tenor music, his facile rendering of the difficult air "Haste ye, shepherds" being specially commendable. The alto solo, "See now the bridegroom," was sung by Master Grover, and the soprano music was entrusted to Masters Ould and Ivimey; the very beautiful air "Oh! my Saviour" being admirably sung by the former, and the "echo" effect given by Master Grover from the organ-loft with very correct intonation. The choruses and chorals were well sung by the Choir (the boys especially showing evidence of careful training), and a marked effect was created by the chorus "Hear, King of angels," already referred to. The shortened form of Evening Prayer was intoned by the Precentor, and a short Special Lesson was read by the Dean between the parts of the selection. Dr. Stainer presided at the organ, and, besides extemporising, played Corelli's "Pastorale" as an opening voluntary. Previous to the commencement of the service the Prince of Wales and Princess Louise, preceded by the Dean, and followed by Canons Farrar and Duckworth, entered the Abbey and took their seats in the nave in close proximity to the Choir. A very large congregation filled the Abbey.

A MEETING of the General Committee of the Leeds Musical Festival was held during the past month, in the Council Chamber, Alderman Addyman (chairman of the Committee), presiding. Councillor Spark (hon. sec.) brought up a report from the Executive Committee. The following are the chief points:—

Six meetings have been held by the Executive Committee since its election by the General Committee. At the first meeting Mr. Thos. Marshall was elected chairman. The works selected for performance include the new oratorio to be written for the Festival by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, entitled "David and Jonathan," Mendelssohn's, "Elijah," Handel's "Samson," Haydn's "Creation" (Parts 1 and 2), Spohr's "Last Judgment," Barnett's new cantata, "The Building of the Ship," Bennett's "May Queen," Mendelssohn's Psalm "When Israel out of Egypt came," and Beethoven's Choral Symphony (No. 9). Offers of works already written, and offers to write new works, for performance at the Festival have, as usual, been numerous. As, however, three new works were arranged for by the Provisional Committee, and have been accepted by the General Committee, these have been considered sufficient, though one or two new pieces are still left over for consideration. The committee have renewed their correspondence with Herr Raff, from whom they hope to obtain an original orchestral work to represent the modern German school at the Festival. Applications from persons desirous of joining the Festival Chorus have been received from 340 singers, of whom 122 are amateurs and 218 professionals. In a very short time the necessary process of testing the abilities of all applicants will be commenced. The Committee hope to be able to secure the services of Mr. Arthur Sullivan as conductor. It has been decided to make application through the Mayor for the Queen's patronage of the Festival, and it has also been resolved to obtain, if possible, the support of the nobility and other influential persons connected with the West Riding, who will be asked to become Vice-Presidents. The Festival is recommended to be held on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, October 13, 14, 15, and 16. No arrangement has yet been made with any principal singers, but several have been named, with whom a correspondence is to be opened. Mr. James Broughton has again been selected as chorus-master.

Mr. T. Marshall moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mr. James Ostler. Discussion having taken place, the report was adopted.

THE programme of Mr. Kuhe's Annual Musical Festival, at the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, although exceedingly interesting, contains only one positive novelty for voices and orchestra—a Biblical Pastoral by Mr. Henry Leslie, entitled "The First Christmas Morn," the words of which are written by the Rev. S. J. Stone. This work, composed expressly for the occasion, will be conducted by Mr. Leslie, and produced on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst., the first day of the Festival. Two other compositions to be given for the first time are a Symphony in B flat by Mr. Walter Macfarren, and an "Etude Symphonique" by the Earl of Dunmore, both of which will be conducted by their respective composers. The works announced to be performed are Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," Costa's "Naaman," Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Handel's "Messiah." There will also be a Classical Concert, conducted by Mr. A. Manns, and Miscellaneous Concerts, one being for the benefit of Mr. Kuhe. The following is the list of artists engaged: Vocalists, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mrs. Osgood, Miss De Fonblanque, Miss Emily Moore, Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Robertson, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Helen Meason, Miss Orridge, and Madame Patey; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Mr. W. Shakespeare, Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Edward Lloyd; Signor Foli, Mr. Frank Ward, Mr. Lewis Thomas, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Santley; solo violin, M. Ovide Musin; solo harmonium, Herr Louis Engel; solo pianoforte, Miss Kuhe and Mr. Kuhe; conductors, Mr. Kuhe, Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Mr. A. Manns.

A MOST successful performance of Mr. Henry Gadsby's Cantata, "The Lord of the Isles," was given by the Brixton Choral Society at the Angell Town Institution, on Monday, the 22nd of December, under the direction of Mr. William Lemare. The music was well sung throughout, the choruses, "Fill high the goblet," "Merrily bounds the bark," and the "Victory" chorus—"The sun gleamed low"—being deserving of especial praise, as giving evidence of the care and attention which had been bestowed upon the work by both Conductor and singers, and which, judging by the applause, appeared to be fully appreciated by the audience. The music of the part of Edith, the Maid of Lorn, found an able exponent in Madame Clara Suter; and Mrs. Bradshaw McKay gained a well-merited encore for her excellent rendering of Isabel's prayer, "Hear, holy virgin." Mr. James Sauvage made a highly favourable impression as Robert Bruce, his singing of the fine Scena, "O holy man!", especially, eliciting the warmest applause. The tenor music was sung by Mr. Gerard Coventry with excellent effect, the Recitative and Air, "'Tis night! the pale orb gleams," being particularly well rendered. The parts of Allaster and the Abbot were allotted to Mr. Wallace Wells and Mr. Henry Winter respectively, the latter gentleman, however, somewhat lacking the dignity of style requisite to give full effect to the impressive music of his part. Mr. Henry Gadsby presided at the pianoforte, and accompanied his own work, thereby materially enhancing the success of the performance.

In our December number we published a letter from the Secretary of the International Mozartstiftung, inviting subscriptions from English lovers of music towards funds for the erection of a protecting roof over Mozart's summer-house, now placed on the Kapuzienerberg in Salzburg, and much exposed to injury from bad weather. In the same number we had the pleasure of printing a first list of subscribers, which we recapitulate below, adding a fresh list of subscriptions collected by Miss Sabilla Novello, in Genoa, and transmitted to us.

The forty-seventh Annual Report of the Sacred Harmonic Society announces that the Committee, after much anxious deliberation consequent upon the intimation that Exeter Hall would not be available for musical purposes beyond October next, resolved to arrange for a series of Final Concerts in the building which had been occupied by the Society for more than forty-five years, leaving it an open question what course would be adopted after the present season. Mention is made of the Handel Festival, this year being the period for its repetition in due course; but it is said that, as the Directors of the Crystal Palace are not yet in a position to enter into negotiations on the subject, the matter must at present remain in abeyance. From the impossibility of securing a building available for the Society's concerts in the metropolis, it is hinted that on leaving Exeter Hall "great and almost vital changes must take place in the Society's organisation and general arrangements." Whatever these changes may lead to in the future, it cannot be forgotten what the Society has done for sacred music in the past; and we, in common with all who appreciate the good it has effected, sincerely hope that it may continue a career which for so many years has reflected the utmost credit upon all concerned in its management.

It is with sincere regret that we announce the death of Mr. James Coward, which took place on the 22nd ult. (after fourteen weeks of acute suffering), in his 56th year. Mr. Coward was organist of St. Mary's, Lambeth, for twenty-three years, afterwards of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and afterwards of St. Magnus the Martyr, London Bridge, which post he held until his death. He was also organist of the Sacred Harmonic Society until within six years of his decease, Grand Organist in the Grand Lodge of Freemasons, and as organist of the Crystal Palace, the duties of which he had fulfilled for twenty-five years, was too well known to need any eulogy from us. He was Conductor of the Abbey Glee Club, and many other Societies; and the composer of a number of successful songs, glees, part-songs, madrigals, &c., several of which (especially "Take thy banner," for men's voices) have attained a wide popularity. For six years Mr. Coward had been much out of health; but he bore up bravely against his afflictions, pursuing an active artistic life until actually incapacitated for work. Not only by the public but by a large circle of friends his loss will long be keenly felt; and at his funeral, which took place at Brompton, on the 28th ult., many earnest sympathisers assembled to pay the last tribute to his memory.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its 132nd consecutive monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms, on Friday, the 2nd ult., the programme being of a miscellaneous description, consisting of songs by Miss Bessie Spear, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. Edward Dalzell, of Westminster Abbey, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom were very warmly received. The music allotted to the choir was mostly of a national character, including "God save the Queen," "Ye Mariners of England," and glees by Sir Sterndale Bennett, Hatton, and Dr. Callcott. Mr. F. R. Kinkee and Miss Edith Mahon were very efficient at the pianoforte, and Mr. Joseph Monday, in the absence of Mr. T. Garside, conducted throughout. It is announced that during the current year the following works will be performed: Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," "Judge me, O God," and "13th Psalm"; Spohr's "God, Thou art great"; Handel's "Acis and Galatea"; Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day"; Macfarren's "May Day"; Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea"; Fox's "John Gilpin" and "Jackdaw of Rheims." Selections will also be given from Handel's "Messiah," "Samson," and "Judas Maccabæus"; Haydn's "Creation"; Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and Bach's "Passion."

The North London Philharmonic Society commenced its third season at the Athenæum, Camden Road, N., on the 5th ult., with a performance of Mr. John Francis Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner," which was conducted by the composer. The solo portions of the work were effectively sung by Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Poole, Mr. Gerard Coventry, and Mr. J. Atherton Latta. The choruses were given with great delicacy and finish, showing considerable improvement upon the performances of the last season, the rendering of the difficult chorus "About, about, in reel and rout" being especially worthy of praise. The second part of the programme included solos for the principal vocalists, Mr. Barnett's orchestral piece "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" (specially arranged by the composer for a small orchestra, with pianoforte obbligato for this concert, the pianoforte part being played by Mr. Barnett with good effect), and Henry Smart's part-song "The Curfew," concluding with Mr. Ebenezer Prout's clever chorus, "Hail to the chief." The orchestra was well led by Mr. A. Truelove, and Mr. A. A. Yeatman rendered efficient aid at the pianoforte. Altogether the Society is to be congratulated on the good progress it is making under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. B. Dart.

The prospectus of the Philharmonic Society for the coming season announces eight Concerts, four before and four after Easter. Stimulated, we presume, by the many observations which have been made respecting the exclusion of compositions by native writers, the Directors have at least done something towards retrieving their character. The only positive novelty, however, appears to be an Overture by Mr. Harold Thomas, for—leaving out of the question Sir W. S. Bennett's Overture "The Naiades"—the other English works promised—an Overture, "Hero and Leander," by Mr. Walter Macfarren; an Aria, "The Golden Gate," by Mr. J. F. Barnett; an Overture, "A Recollection of the Past," by Mr. C. E. Stephens; and a Pianoforte Concerto, by Mr. A. H. Jackson—have been heard elsewhere. Madame Montigny-Remaury, Mdlles. Bertha and Anna Mehlig, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Herr Scharwenka will appear during the season as solo pianists; the violinists will be Herr Joachim and Senor Sarasate, the violoncellist is Signor Piatti, and the vocalists already named are Miss Robertson, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, and Mr. J. Maas. The first Concert takes place on the 5th inst.

A SOCIETY has been formed in Norwich for the practice and performance of vocal part-music of the highest order. It is known as the Norwich Gate-house Choir, and consists of about seventy picked voices. In addition to the vocal music, it is proposed to introduce at each Concert of the Society instrumental chamber music (classical), to be performed by professional artists of repute. At the Concert given on the 9th ult., the vocal pieces were Bishop's "Where art thou, beam of light"; Mozart's "Placido è il mar" (Idomeneo); Kücken's "Blanche"; Abt's "Night song"; Hatton's "I met her in the quiet lane," and a new part-song "Sleep, lady, sleep," composed expressly for the Society by Dr. Gladstone (Organist of Norwich Cathedral). The artists engaged were Mons. Dubrucq (oboe); Mr. Henry Lazarus (clarionet); Mr. Charles Harper (horn), and Mr. W. B. Wotton (bassoon). Beethoven's Quintet in E flat, Op. 16 (Mr. Kingston Rudd at the pianoforte), was performed in its entirety, and Mons. Dubrucq, Mr. Lazarus, and Mr. W. B. Wotton contributed each a solo. The Conductor was Mr. Kingston Rudd.

THE proposal for the establishment of a Society of Musicians in Wales has been recently discussed at Carnarvon Guildhall, there being a large representative gathering of persons interested in the music of Wales. The formation of the Society was decided upon, the Rev. E. Stephen (Tanymarian), composer of the Oratorio "The Sea of Tiberias," being elected president, and Dr. Parry of the University College of Wales, vice-president. Mr. J. Richards (Bangor), and Mr. J. Thomas (Llanwrtyd), were appointed honorary secretaries for North and South Wales respectively, and Mr. John Roberts (Portmadoc), was chosen as the honorary treasurer, the executive committee being composed of many persons of influence in the Principality. There can be little doubt that the late Festival at Oswestry, organised and conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie (a short notice of which appeared in our October number), has given an impetus to the movement for the formation of a Welsh Musical Society, which we sincerely hope may be productive of the most beneficial results to the art.

THE second Concert of the Crouch End Choral Society took place at Christ Church Schoolroom, on Tuesday, the 6th ult., before a large audience. The first part of the programme contained a selection from the "Messiah," the solos of which were excellently rendered by Madame Emma Beesley, Miss E. Marchant, Mr. A. J. Thompson, and Mr. Egbert Roberts, the latter obtaining a well merited encore for his fine rendering of "Why do the nations." The band and chorus (numbering 120 performers) kept well together throughout. The second part was devoted to Old English part-songs, madrigals, and ballads, the choir being most successful in Morley's "My bonny lass," and Purcell's "Come if you dare," the solo being well sung by Mr. Thompson. Madame Beesley and Miss Marchant were equally successful in their songs, for which they obtained encores. Mrs. Alfred Dye presided at the piano, Mr. S. Dean Grimson led the band, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

AT the Concert of the Edinburgh Choral Union, on the 5th ult., Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new orchestral work, "Rhapsodie Ecossaise" produced a marked effect upon the audience, and has since received the warmest eulogiums from the local papers. It consists of three movements, in the first of which the melody of the song "Muirland Willie" is treated in a free and bold style; the second introduces "Braw, braw lads," and the third has for its theme the air set to Burns's descriptive song, "There was a lad was born in Kyrle." All these subjects are wrought out with excellent effect and musicianly skill; and the applause at the conclusion was warm and unanimous. The piece was finely played, under the direction of Mr. August Manns, who has expressed his intention of producing this, and another new work by the same composer, at the Crystal Palace.

DR. STAINER, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, and Mr. John Thomas, Harpist to Her Majesty, have been appointed Principal Musical Adjudicators of the National Eisteddfod of Wales, which will be held at Carnarvon, North Wales, in the month of August next. The chief prize offered for choral-singing is £150 and a gold medal, to choirs consisting of not less than 100 and not above 150 voices, for the best rendering of "See from his post" (Handel's "Belshazzar"), and the last Chorus from Rossini's "Stabat Mater" (Novello's version). The total amount of money offered as prizes in the musical department of this year's Festival exceeds £350, and the total for all departments amounts to nearly £700. The Festival, which is under the patronage of the nobility of the Principality, will continue for four days, and any surplus which may accrue is to be handed over to charitable institutions.

THE second Concert by the Paddington Choral Union was given on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., in the schoolroom of Paddington Chapel, Marylebone Road. The programme, which was a very varied and attractive one, was divided into two portions—sacred and secular. The former included Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," Miss Bowron taking the solo part. Madame Talbot Cherer contributed Topliffe's "Consider the lilies" in the first part, and "Esmeralda" in the second. Messrs. Holmes, Watts, Grimditch, Noble, and others, greatly added to the success of the concert by the singing of several pieces. The choir, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Moon, very ably rendered a selection of choruses from the "Creation." Mr. Horace G. Holmes was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. John Spink, jun., presided at the harmonium.

A RECITAL of Gounod's "Faust" was given at the Royal Albert Hall, on the 17th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. Carter. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington sang the music of Marguerite, and Signor Foli that of Mephistopheles, and it is needless to add that these artists acquitted themselves with their accustomed success. The other characters were represented by Mr. Trelawney Cobham (Faust), Mr. Sauvage (Valentine), and Madame Mary Cummings (Siebel), the latter being warmly applauded in the "Flower Song." The organ accompaniment in the Cathedral Scene was effectively played by Mr. Bending, and it is perhaps hardly necessary to state that the "Soldiers' Chorus" was encored.

THE Bach Choir will give two Concerts during the present season at St. James's Hall, the dates announced being Tuesday, March 16, and Wednesday, April 21. The works to be performed are the Magnificat of Bach, a Sanctus in D by the same composer, Brahms's "Deutsches Requiem," Beethoven's "Meeresstille," Cherubini's Mass in D minor, and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." The Mass by Cherubini, the grandest specimen of its composer's church music, will be especially welcome to amateurs, as it has seldom, if ever, been given in this country. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt will continue to hold the post of Conductor to the choir.

A CONCERT was given at St. Peter's School-rooms, Great Windmill Street, W., on the 26th ult. A lengthy programme was successfully gone through, several items being encored. The vocalists were Miss E. Reed, Miss A. Cox, Miss J. M. Hill, Messrs. Humm, Rendell, W. Dorey, and Froome. Piano duets and solos were given by Miss E. Froome, Miss R. Hardy, and Mr. A. Dorey, and the programme was varied by two glees, capitally rendered by the four gentlemen above-named, and two readings by Mr. W. H. Secker. Mr. A. Dorey (Organist of St. Peter's) accompanied throughout.

THE Singing Classes which have met for so many years under the tuition and conduct of Mr. George Wells, at Carter Lane, City, being obliged to seek a new home at Christmas last, a réunion of the members was held at the Aldersgate Ward Schools, on Tuesday evening, December 30, when a very handsome timepiece was presented to Mr. Wells, on their behalf, by Mr. B. D. Pope, who, in an eulogistic speech, referred to the high appreciation in which his efforts were held by the whole of the classes. The members afterwards sang an excellent selection of glees, part-songs, &c.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS gave an interesting "Matinée Musicale" at Steinway Hall, on the 22nd ult., which was scarcely so well attended as it should have been, considering the attractive nature of the programme. The selection included Rubinstein's Sonata (Op. 19) for piano and violin, and Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 2, No. 3). An alteration in the programme was rendered necessary by the indisposition of M. Lasserre. The playing of Madame Viard-Louis and of M. Hollander (violin) created a marked effect; and the singing of Madame Edith Touzeau and Signor Ghilberti elicited warm applause.

THE following is a list of the candidates who have passed the recent First B.Mus. Examination at the University of London. First Division: Wilfred Collet, Trinity College, London; Clifford Blackburn Edgar, Owens College; William James Foxell, B.A., private study; Charles John Hall, private study; William Henry Hunt, private study; John David McClure, B.A., private study. Second Division: William Hamlyn, B.A., private study; John Badcock Harris, private study.

WE were compelled, in consequence of the Christmas holidays, to publish our January number so unusually early that several communications were unavoidably passed over. A paragraph stating the date of our going to press was inserted in the December number; but as many correspondents who have forwarded us notices of interest may not have seen this announcement, we again draw attention to the fact.

MR. OLIVER KING has been honoured with the appointment of Pianist to H.R.H. the Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), and sailed for Canada in the suite of H.R.H. on the 22nd ult. Mr. King studied for some years at the Conservatoire at Leipzig, and is known as the composer of several important pianoforte pieces and works for the orchestra.

THE Organ Recitals at Bow were resumed on the 17th ult., when Mr. W. T. Best's playing attracted a large and appreciative audience. On the 24th ult. Mr. Geo. E. Blunden, and on the 31st Mr. Frederic Archer, presided at the organ; whilst the engagements for the present month include—on the 7th, Dr. A. L. Peace; 14th, Mr. W. Rea; and 21st, Mr. W. T. Best.

THE Madrigal Society offers two prizes, of 10 and 5 guineas respectively, for two madrigals, to be written in the style of the seventeenth-century composers. The Rev. T. Helmore, Dr. Stainer, Kellow J. Pye, Esq., and Otto Goldschmidt, Esq., will act as judges. Full particulars will be found in our advertising columns.

THE death is announced of the wife of Frederic Penna, and mother of Miss Catherine Penna. A niece of the Dowager Countess of Essex, formerly Miss Stephens, she will be remembered chiefly as the soprano of the duet singers, the Misses Smith, who were highly popular some years ago, especially in Scotland and Ireland.

BACH'S Passion (St. Matthew) will be sung at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, every Friday during Lent at 8 p.m., beginning on the 20th inst. The tenor and alto parts will be rendered by Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Sexton respectively, and the organ accompaniment will be played by Mr. W. de M. Sergison.

MAJOR-GENERAL LORD CHELMSFORD, G.C.B., has kindly consented to preside at the 142nd Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain, at Willis's Rooms, on Wednesday, March 17. This Society is now supporting fifty-five members and widows of deceased musicians.

A TESTIMONIAL consisting of a handsome dining-room clock was recently presented to Mr. Charles Cull, from the choir and congregation of Bedfordbury Mission Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, on his retirement, after ten years' tenure, from the post of Organist.

AT the practices of the Cheltenham Musical Society, Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," selection from Gounod's "Faust," and Mendelssohn's "To the Sons of Art," will be rehearsed, with a view to their performance at a Concert after Easter.

THE Committee of the Barker Fund, at their final meeting, held on Friday, the 7th ult., after auditing the accounts, resolved to hand over the remaining balance of £67 to Madame Barker, the widow of the late Mr. C. S. Barker.

IN our list of those who were admitted to the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford, on November 27, the name of Arthur William Marchant, New College, and of Brecknock Road, London, N., was omitted.

A RECITAL on Messrs. Pleyel, Wolff and Co.'s new Pedalier is announced to be given by M. Marlois, on the 2nd inst., at St. George's Hall.

REVIEWS.

Johann Sebastian Bach. Von Philipp Spitta. Zweiter Band. [Leipzig: Breitkopf and Härtel.]

AFTER an interval of seven years, the second and concluding volume of Herr Spitta's masterly monograph has at length made its appearance. The long period that has elapsed since the publication of the first volume will surprise no reader of the second; for the research involved in the collection of the enormous amount of material here to be found must necessarily have been the work of years. It is evident that the author has spared no pains to make his volume worthy of its theme.

When reviewing the first volume of this book in these columns some time since (see "THE MUSICAL TIMES" for May, 1877), we spoke of the great difficulty of giving any adequate idea of so elaborate a work within reasonable limits. We can repeat what we then said with even more emphasis as regards the second half of the work; for the volume now lying before us contains no fewer than 1,034 pages, including twenty pages of musical illustrations. Moreover, this second half of the biography treats of the ripest and artistically the most important period of Bach's career—from 1723, when he became Cantor at the Thomas-Schule in Leipzig, to his death in 1750. It was between these dates that most of his finest works were written—the Passions according to John and Matthew, the "Christmas Oratorio," the great Mass in B minor, most of the best Church Cantatas, the "Art of Fugue," the second part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier," and many other compositions that might be named. Not only are most of these works analysed in considerable detail, but all the information attainable with regard to their origin, date, &c., is given in full, all doubtful matters being carefully discussed.

Instead of attempting a systematic review of so voluminous a work as this, it will probably be more interesting to our readers to refer to some special points which we have marked in reading, as throwing light upon disputed matters, or dealing with questions of musical importance.

All musicians who have studied Bach's scores, and who have also had an opportunity of hearing performances of the same, must have been struck by the difference of the effect produced in reading and in hearing. No matter how carefully prepared may have been the music, or how perfect the rendering of each individual part, there are always many points which appear very effective in reading, but which are lost entirely in an actual performance. A report prepared by Bach for the Town Council at Leipzig, in 1730, on the requirements of music for the four churches the choirs of which were supplied by the Thomas-Schule, which report is given in the present volume (pp. 74 to 79), furnishes an explanation of the difference just referred to. From this most interesting document we learn that his chorus consisted of at least three singers to each part—twelve in all. This small choir was accompanied by an orchestra composed as follows: two first and two second violins, two first and two second violas, two violoncellos, one double-bass, two or (when required) three oboes, one or two bassoons, three trumpets, and kettledrums, besides occasionally two flutes. Two suggestions arise from this enumeration. In the first place, an orchestra of at least eighteen against a chorus of twelve shows a balance of tone the very reverse of that to which we are accustomed; and, secondly, the constitution of the orchestra itself helps us to understand Bach's method of instrumentation. In his scores each part seems always of equal importance. In our large modern orchestras a solo for the oboe, or for the flute in its lower octave, would be very indistinctly heard, if at all, against ten or twelve first violins and as many seconds, playing forte; but when there were only two first and two second violins the effect would be entirely different. It is evident that even doubling the wind parts in our performances of Bach would not be sufficient to restore the balance; and as there is but little prospect of our hearing these works with a band of eighteen and a chorus of twelve, we must content ourselves with imagining as well as we can, from reading the scores, what it was that Bach really intended.

A question that has been greatly, and almost fiercely, discussed in Germany is the method in which Bach filled up the accompaniments to his solos from the figured bass. The subject was probably first mooted by Robert Franz, in his now well-known "Offener Brief an Eduard Hanslick," published in 1871. Franz gives a very strong opinion that Bach's music requires to be filled up in the contrapuntal and polyphonic style; and in his additional accompaniments to the "Passion according to Matthew," the "Magnificat," and several of the Church Cantatas, he has shown in how masterly a manner the work can be done. On the other hand Herr Spitta, Dr. Chrysander, and others, maintain that Bach used a much simpler accompaniment. On this point much light is thrown by the present volume. Herr Spitta was fortunate enough to obtain in 1876 a very interesting manuscript by Heinrich Nicolaus Gerber, a pupil of Sebastian Bach, and the father of the well-known lexicographer. This manuscript is a Sonata by the Venetian composer Albinoni, for violin, with accompaniment for a figured bass. The accompaniment has been written out in full by Gerber, and contains the autograph corrections of Bach himself. These corrections are comparatively few in number, from which we may infer that the master was in general satisfied with the pupil's work; and it may be inferred that the Sonata, which is reprinted in its entirety at the end of the present volume, shows us Bach's method of accompanying from a figured bass. The harpsichord part, as here given, is a free and flowing four-part harmony, with frequent passing notes, suspensions, &c., even where such are not indicated by the figured bass; but of imitative counterpoint we find scarcely a trace, even in passages which would obviously admit of such imitation, were it thought desirable. The inference appears clear that the polyphonic style which Franz has chiefly made use of in his accompaniments, though justifiable by the analogy of many movements which Bach himself has accompanied in this manner, is not a necessity. It seems to us probable that for the sake of contrast the composer intended the figured bass to be filled up in a simple manner. The evidence afforded by this Sonata of Albinoni's is of course not finally decisive, because the music, which is in the old Italian style, is in many respects different from that of Bach himself; and it is therefore possible that, in his own works, another method of procedure may have been adopted; but the balance of probabilities appears at present to lie in the opposite direction.

It is generally known that Bach is said to have written in all five Passions, three of which are unknown. On these Herr Spitta gives us some valuable information. They were the "Passion according to Mark," a lyrical version (words by Picander), similar in form to the "Passion of Christ" set by Handel, and the "Passion according to Luke." Of these the first two are lost; but the author gives very strong reasons for the opinion that the most important part of the "Passion according to Mark" has been preserved in another form. It is well known that Bach, like Handel, frequently re-arranged his music to other words; and Herr Spitta shows that in all probability the greater part of the Mark Passion was taken from the beautiful "Funeral Ode" for Queen Christiana Eberhardine, written in the year 1727, and published in the Bach Society's edition—a fact which was first hinted at by Herr Rust in his preface to the 20th volume of that edition. Of the lyrical setting of the Passion—dating probably from 1725—nothing is known. A manuscript of the "Passion according to Luke" exists in Bach's autograph. As it is known that he very frequently wrote out for his own use the compositions of others, much discussion has been raised as to the genuineness of this work. Herr Spitta devotes several pages to a full analysis of the music, and after a careful consideration of the arguments on both sides, comes to the conclusion that the work is undoubtedly composed by Bach, but that it belongs to his early period, and was most probably written while he was at Weimar.

It would be interesting, did our space allow, to speak of Herr Spitta's able analyses of the Masses, Cantatas (sacred and secular) and Oratorios; but we must refer our readers for these to the volume itself, and pass on to say a few words about Bach's method of teaching. Herr Spitta prints for the first time a Thorough Bass Method compiled by Bach for his pupils, a manuscript copy of which, evidently written by one of the pupils, most probably from Bach's dictation, is in the possession of Professor Wagener, of Marburg. It occupies thirty-eight octavo pages, and is equally valuable for the clearness of its rules, and for the examples, which are doubtless Bach's own. In Chapter 5 of his Method, Bach expressly says that when once a pupil is well grounded in Thorough Bass, "he may be assured that he has already mastered a great part of the whole art." We further learn, on the authority of his pupil Kirnberger, that Bach commenced the study of Counterpoint with his pupils not in two parts, according to the system of Fux, which has been adopted by Cherubini, Albrechtsberger, and most modern authorities, but in four, regarding the four-part chord as the basis of the whole structure. This plan is also used by the late E. F. Richter, whose Counterpoint, however, is more in the free than in the strict style. From two of Bach's pupils, Gerber and Agricola, we know something of the general course of study which he set before them. They first worked through his "Inventions," then a set of Suites, and the "Wohltemperirte Clavier." Then the study of Thorough Bass was commenced; but instead of the pupil inventing his own basses, he had to harmonize the basses of the violin sonatas of Albinoni, already spoken of. Then came studies in Counterpoint, using chorals for canti fermi.

We have not spoken of more than a very small portion of the new and interesting facts contained in Herr Spitta's book; yet we have considerably exceeded the ordinary limits of a review. The volume is, in truth, so rich in material that it has been our object rather to stimulate than to satisfy the curiosity of our readers, and to induce those who understand German to procure it for themselves. We might fill entire columns with extracts, and yet fail to do justice to the work. It is a worthy monument to the memory of one of the greatest composers that the world has seen, and throughout so full of interest that every lover of Bach will read it with avidity. For ourselves we confess that when we had once taken it up we found it difficult to put it down again; and this, we doubt not, will be the experience of many readers besides ourselves.

Songs from the Published Works of Alfred Tennyson. Set to music by various composers. Edited by W. G. Cusins. [C. Kegan Paul and Co.]

(Second Notice.)

Continuing our progress through this very interesting volume we come first upon a setting by Herr Georg Henschel of the well-known lines—

> On thy cold gray stones, O sea.

These exquisite verses have been often allied with music, but never on such equal terms as now. Herr Henschel has not only penetrated to the depth of their meaning, but shown himself able to express it in the terms of his art. In the music, therefore, we recognise the sadness and beauty of the poetry, each answering to each as regards the quality of "tender grace." The change from minor to major, and the manner in which it is led up to on the words, "O, well for the fisherman's boy," &c., are admirable features in the song, which, generally, we commend as one of the few entirely successful settings of our Laureate's work. There is merit also in Mr. C. Hubert Parry's music to "The Poet's Song":

> The rain had fallen, the Poet arose,
> He pass'd by the town and out of the street.

It is necessarily of a simpler cast than Herr Henschel's, but its effect is pleasing, and its details are musicianly. In composing "The Brook":

I come from haunts of coot and hern,
I make a sudden sally.

Mr. W. G. Cusins had difficulty in keeping Schubert's "Brooklet" out of his mind. This we do not wonder at in the least, nor are we surprised to find that he did not entirely succeed. But the result is none the worse on this account. An artist may be influenced by a faultless model without copying it, and as Mr. Cusins's music ripples along with a suggestion of Schubert in it, no one feels disposed to complain. The likeness is one more of spirit than of letter. To Mr. August Manns was confided the Cradle Song:

What does little Birdie say,
In her nest at break of day?

We are not of opinion that the result will deter other composers from trying their fortune with these charming verses. Simplicity is essential to music of the kind, no doubt, but simplicity alone hardly suffices.

Mr. Walter Macfarren had some difficult lines to set in those beginning—

All along the valley, stream that flashest white, Deepening thy voice with the deepening of the night, but he proves to have been quite equal to the task. His music presents not a few excellent features, among them the brilliancy of an accompaniment which keeps ever before the eye of the listener the subject of the song. We meet with the editor, Mr. W. G. Cusins, again in "The Sailor Boy":

He rose at dawn and, fired with hope,
Shot o'er the seething harbour-bar.

These lines are treated in a thoroughly dramatic spirit, the ordinary forms being entirely laid aside. The piece is, in fact, a brief scena, as we now understand the term, and in each episode it is clear that the composer feels and adequately expresses the prevailing sentiment. The song is one of its composer's best efforts. Merlin's song—

Rain, rain and sun! a rainbow in the sky!
A young man will be wiser by and by;

fell to Herr Joseph Joachim, whose music constitutes certainly not the least interesting feature in the volume. If space were available for the detailed criticism which many of these pieces deserve and almost require, we should dwell long upon the Hungarian master's work. It has points of considerable originality and others of quite as considerable charm, but we must rest content with stating the broad fact, and asking for the song the attention of our readers when the volume comes into their hands. Mr. Cusins once more appears in the vigorous "Song of King Arthur's Knight:"

Blow trumpet, for the world is white with May,
Blow trumpet, the long night hath rolled away!
Blow thro' the living world—"Let the King reign!"

This is set as a concerted piece for two tenors and two basses, in which we are scarcely able to recognise the merit obvious in the composer's solos. The music strikes us, indeed, as commonplace. Not so that of Mr. Frederic Corder in—

O sun, that wakenest all to bliss or pain,
O moon, that layest all to sleep again,
Shine sweetly; twice my love hath smiled on me.

The elegance and feeling of these verses are well reflected by the music, and there is not, to us, a more successful song in the volume. The middle portion, in the dominant key, on the words, "O dewy flowers, that open to the sun," &c., is simply exquisite, not alone in itself, but by contrast of style and feeling with that which goes before and that which follows. The pages on which Mr. Corder's music is printed will not be the least "thumbed" of the many in this book. Enid's song—

Turn, Fortune, turn thy wheel and lower the proud,
Turn thy wild wheel thro' sunshine, storm and cloud;
Thy wheel and thee we neither love nor hate.

was allotted to Herr Silas who saw in it without difficulty a suggestion for the prevailing form of his music. Hence we have an arpeggio accompaniment, as unvarying as the whirl of a spinning-wheel, underlying a simple but not inexpressive melody. Few composers would desire for themselves the task of setting music to Vivien's song: "If Love, if Love be Love, if Love be ours," &c., full as it is of the Laureate's most unlyrical mannerisms. Fancy a poor musician brooding over a verse like this:

My name, once mine, now thine, is closelier mine,
For fame, could fame be mine, that fame were thine,
And shame, could shame be thine, that shame were mine,
So trust me not at all, or all in all.

Yet Miss (or Mrs.) Emily Josephine Troup essayed these verses (except the one just quoted) with the heroism of her sex, and has really done better with them than we were prepared to find. Her music is far in advance of that by the average lady composer. The name of Mr. J. Blumenthal excites expectations most of which are realised in his setting of—

Sweet is true love, tho' given in vain, in vain;
And sweet is death, who puts an end to pain;
I know not which is sweeter; no, not I.

The happy fancy of this composer in works of the kind appears here to great advantage, and the song is certain to please cultured and uncultured ears. The solemn lines, which religious England has taken to its heart of hearts, come next:

Late, late, so late! and dark the night and chill;
Late, late, so late! but we can enter still.
Too late; too late, ye cannot enter now.

Professor Macfarren's music to these verses is conceived in a reverent and becoming spirit. It is simple, but lends itself to all the full and pathetic expression a great singer would give. Certain kinds of poetry will not endure elaborate musical treatment, but demand such strains as most readily allow the vocal artist to bring to bear the power of human utterance. So in this case, and, indeed, it is open to question whether a gifted speaker could not recite Tennyson's mournful lines with as much effect as a singer could sing them. Any how, elaborate musical treatment would here defeat its own purpose, and Professor Macfarren was not likely to overlook the fact. We admire his work as much for what it leaves out as for what it contains. A further contribution from the Editor appears in—

As through the land at eve we went,
And pluck'd the ripened ears,
We fell out, my wife and I,
O we fell out I know not why,
And kiss'd again with tears.

Mr. Cusins is much happier here than in one or two previous instances. He has caught the homely, affectionate spirit of the text, and written a little song which, though it may never be heard in concert-rooms, will find a welcome in many a family circle. Mr. Harold Thomas's "Sweet and low" strikes us as being a little out of harmony with its theme. We see nothing in the poet's lines to justify the use of showy arpeggios, flashing through several octaves. The baby, instead of going to sleep, would want to play with them. Saying this we must not be understood to complain of the music per se. The "Bugle Song"—

The splendour falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story—has been set by Sir Herbert Oakeley for voice, pianoforte and cornet or bugle obbligato, the wind instrument, of course, doing liberal service in the character of Echo. We have no doubt that this song (here republished by the way) would prove acceptable in the concert-room, where the effect of the cornet could hardly fail to meet with instant appreciation. Next in order come two settings of "Tears, idle tears," by Herr Joachim Raff, that prolific composer, when asked for one, having characteristically sent double the number. We cannot recognise either as the ideal of music for such words; but we much prefer the second to the first, wherein Herr Raff indulges to the full his passion for queer harmonies and queerer progressions. Students of composition might profitably examine this work for hints as to what they should avoid. The companion piece is far more musicianly, and infinitely more true to the poet's thought. Indeed, this song contains some remarkably fine passages, worthy of Raff at his best. To Mr. F. H. Cowen fell the grateful task of writing music for—

O swallow, swallow, flying, flying south,
Fly to her, and fall upon her gilded eaves,
And tell her, tell her, what I tell to thee.

The young musician has discharged his task capitally, and given us a perfectly charming song, which ought to become a favourite everywhere. Alike in conception and technical execution it is good. The very spirit of the passionate words breathes in every bar. Mr. Francesco Berger is next in the list of composers, his text being the grand passage which, well-known as it is, we cannot omit to transcribe:

Thy voice is heard thro' rolling drums,
That beat to battle where he stands;
Thy face across his fancy comes,
And gives the battle to his hands.
A moment, while the trumpets blow,
He sees his brood about thy knee;
The next, like fire he meets the foe,
And strikes him dead for thine and thee.

Noble as these lines are, they did not inspire Mr. Berger, nor lift him above conventional pianoforte imitations of drums and trumpets. Even if drums and trumpets were available it would not be necessary to introduce them into the music, simply because they are mentioned as adjuncts to the poetry; but to imitate them through such a medium as the pianoforte is a grave error, the more regrettable here because the music gives evidence of capacity. In the setting of—

Home they brought her warrior, dead!
She nor swoon'd nor utter'd cry,

Signor Randegger appears to considerable advantage. He opens the song with a solemn march theme, suggested more or less throughout the first verse, and thenceforward follows the course of the story in the same spirit of dramatic illustration. The music is somewhat elaborate in structure, but not too much so for the character of poetry which, its simple pathos notwithstanding, suggests a magnificent gallery picture rather than a "bit" for the cabinet. We easily recognise the hand of Mr. Berthold Tours in the music to lines beginning—

Our enemies have fallen, have fallen; the seed,
The little seed they laughed at in the dark,
Has risen and cleft the soil, &c.

Here, also, the structure of the song is elaborate, and its expression dramatic; so much so as to lift the piece out of the category to which it, in name, belongs. Concerning the ability displayed there can arise no question. Work of this calibre tells its own story, and indicates a possibility of something still better, provided, as in the present case, inducements to labour were forthcoming. The little lyric beginning—

Ask me no more: the moon may draw the sea,
The cloud may stoop from heaven and take the shape,
With fold to fold, of mountain or of cape;
But, O too fond, when have I answered thee?

has been set by Mrs. Florence A. Marshall with a good deal of fancy and musicianly skill; while not a little boldness here and there in Mr. Francis Hueffer's "Now sleeps the crimson petal, now the white" evidences the composer's practical adhesion to modern ideas of musical liberty. M. Saint-Saëns is the author of the next song, in which the French master deals with the passage from "Maud":

A voice by the cedar-tree
In the meadow under the hall!

He begins splendidly, and there is the true ring in every bar of the stimulating music illustrative of "a passionate ballad, gallant and gay," which Maud sings under the cedar. The next section is less well marked, for reasons easily found in the poetry; but the final Andante winds up well, and leaves an impression that among the really successful illustrators of our Tennyson a place is deserved by Saint-Saëns. Liszt follows with music to—

Go not happy day
From the shining fields.

In the main this song will be looked upon as a disappointment. There are a few effective bits in it, but the general effect is surprisingly tame and cold, having regard to the composer's usual and most successful style. We can only account for it by assuming that Liszt's acquaintance with English was not great enough to place him thoroughly en rapport with his theme. M. Massenet's "Come into the garden, Maud," though characteristic of the author of "Le Roi de Lahore," will certainly not displace Balfe's music to the same words; but if there were ever so popular a version of "Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky," it would have a formidable rival in M. Gounod's new setting. By simplest means, yet with admirable fidelity, M. Gounod suggests "the tintinabulation of the bells, wild bells," and over the whole music he has thrown a glamour equal to that pervading the poetry. The song is a gem in its way, and will not be allowed to pass out of mind. Next follow two songs by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, one of which, "Hapless doom of woman, happy in betrothing," is here republished. The novelty is a setting of the pretty lines:

Shame upon you, Robin,
Shame upon you now!
Kiss me would you? with my hands
Milking the cow.

The music is as quaintly charming as the words, and both together ought to make a favourite selection in drawing-room and concert-hall. Mr. Stanford may be congratulated upon a marked success in this effort of his lighter muse. We have now reached the end, the long procession closing with Mr. W. H. Cummings's version of "Edith's Song"—

Two young lovers in winter weather,
None to guide them.

Of this it may be said with truth, "though last, not least." The music is worthy of an artist-musician who by the fairest means has won a distinguished place in the ranks of our composers and vocalists.

One reflection will occur to all who look carefully through the volume, and it is this: "How admirably, for the most part, the English musicians represented have done their work!" Some, indeed, may be surprised, not to say astonished, at the ability shown, after comparing it with the average merit of songs made "to sell" by the same hands. The reason probably is that each composer felt at perfect liberty to consult his own purely musical taste, and so did himself full justice. If so, we have another ground for satisfaction at the appearance of the volume, and an additional inducement to hope that more of our English poets may in due time receive the honour so justly awarded here to Alfred Tennyson.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.
The Harmonium, by King Hall.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In his preface to the present work, Mr. Hall justly regrets that so few musicians are acquainted with the capabilities of the Harmonium, and combats the very common, though entirely erroneous, impression that anybody who can play the piano or organ is therefore qualified, without special study or tuition, to play the harmonium also. We think it is chiefly because of the misapprehension just referred to that the instrument has not advanced more rapidly in public favour. The average performances of amateurs on the Harmonium are, to a refined musical ear, simply distressing; and as it is probable that at least nine people out of ten have never heard the instrument properly played, it is not surprising that its merits should not be appreciated.

Those who know Mr. Hall's large "School for the Harmonium" will not need to be told that he thoroughly understands the subject which he treats. The present little work differs in some matters both of detail and arrangement from its predecessor. Additional experience has enabled the author to correct, where necessary, and to supplement the information contained in the earlier work; and after a careful examination of the Primer we have no hesitation in pronouncing it a thoroughly reliable authority upon the instrument.

After a short historical introduction, entitled "Sketch of the Free Reed," Mr. Hall describes the construction of the Harmonium. This part of the work is illustrated by some very clear diagrams, drawn expressly for the book. The keyboard and the stops are next treated of, and plans are given of the different arrangement of the stops in instruments of various sizes, the quality and pitch of the registers being dealt with in some detail. As the book is certain to reach a second edition, we think it will be well to offer one or two suggestions for the completion of this part of the subject. In one variety of the Harmonium frequently used at public performances—the one known as the "Alexandre Concert Model"—the arrangement of the stops differs materially from any given in the plans on page 19. Here the "Voix Céleste," instead of being No. 6, and of sixteen-foot pitch, is No. 5, and of eight-foot pitch, and it is completed by a bass half, labelled "Voix Humaine," No. 5, also of eight-feet pitch; while in the same instrument the "Musette" is No. 6 and not No. 5. As an instrument of this kind is more often met with than the large Harmonium shown in fig. 4, page 19, it would, we think, be well to say something about it in future editions. Another point worth mentioning is that we can find no reference at all to what is known as the "double touch." This mechanical adjustment of the keys plays so important a part in many Harmoniums (especially in those of M. Mustel), that it would be well to explain it in future editions. Students who are not acquainted with its use will otherwise be very likely to be considerably discomposed on playing for the first time on an instrument in which it is found. Mr. Hall is no doubt familiar with it, and we call attention to the omission that it may be rectified in future editions.

The directions and exercises for blowing leave nothing to desire either in clearness or completeness; while the chapter on the combination of stops, and more especially the "general remarks" (pages 29—34) with the very novel "combination tables" on page 33, are really admirable. We next find a series of exercises on fingering, and a number of special "studies for blowing," in which some of the technical peculiarities of the instrument are well illustrated; and the work is completed with thirteen original pieces, many of which are not only interesting as music, but most instructive to the learner, as showing him how to make the most of the special resources at his disposal. We trust that the publication of this Primer may do something to remove the prejudice against and increase the knowledge of the too often despised and rejected Harmonium.

The Little Drummer. Words by Clara Kappey, after H. von Fallersleben's "Paukenschläger."
Wind. Words by H. Baldwin.
The Lark now leaves his wat'ry nest. Words by Sir William Davenant.
Four-part songs, composed by J. A. Kappey.
[Boosey and Co.]

All these unpretentious songs show much musical feeling, the first, however, being the best of the three. This composition, being written for the members of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society, has been already successfully tested in public. No. 2 is carefully written and melodious; but we like not the accentuation of the words where the time changes to 3-4. No. 3 has many good points; and, if well sung, would we think prove extremely effective. Mr. Kappey might doubtless, judging from these specimens, succeed in a higher class of writing.

FOREIGN NOTES.

We have received the following interesting communication from Professor F. W. Jähns, of Berlin, the well-known authority in matters connected with the works of C. M. von Weber, respecting the recent first publication of a cantata by that composer: "A notice has appeared in a late issue of the Dresdener Nachrichten directing the attention of the readers of that journal to what is styled a newly discovered or 'exhumed' work by C. M. von Weber. This expression is used with regard to a cantata written by Weber in the year 1821, on the occasion of the anniversary of the birth of a member of the royal family of Saxony, and which has just been published for the first time by Kistner, of Leipzig. The editor, Herr Carl Bank, has acquitted himself of his task in a manner worthy of the immortal composer, having moreover substituted new words of more general application for those originally employed for the special occasion for which they were intended, and commencing with 'Du, bekränzend uns're Laren.' Thus far, then, the musical public has every reason to feel indebted to Herr Bank, while he himself would probably be the last to claim the merit attributed to him by the journal in question of having 'exhumed, à la Schliemann,' this cantata of Weber's. He must, doubtless, be well aware of the fact that in my book on Weber ('C. M. von Weber in seinen Werken'), published in 1871, this cantata is mentioned at some length under No. 283, p. 340, including dates of composition and first performance, together with a characteristic of the work, its subsequent partial utilisation by the composer in the first finale of 'Euryanthe,' and the whereabouts of the manuscript. In the face of these facts it is difficult to see how the edition of the cantata issued by Herr Bank can in any sense be described as a 'discovery.' Suum cuique!" So far we have quoted Professor Jähns, to whose communication, apart from its interesting subject-matter, we extend the more willingly the publicity of our columns, since we are fully alive to his unique merits in regard to the elucidation and determination of facts and details relating to the compositions of C. M. von Weber, which render his labour a monumental one for future generations. The Professor is, we understand, preparing for publication a supplementary volume to his "C. M. von Weber in seinen Werken," containing much additional information concerning the works of the composer of "Freischütz" and "Oberon."

The cyclus of historical performances of Mozart's operas was announced to be inaugurated at the Imperial Viennese Opera on the 25th ult., occupying a week, the order of representations being as follows: "Idomeneo," "Seraglio," "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Don Giovanni," "Così fan tutte," "Zauberflöte," "La Clemenza di Tito." Among the lady artists engaged in the performance are mentioned Mesdames Pauline Lucca, Bianchi, and Schuch-Proska. A similar historical week dedicated to Mozart's operas was to be held simultaneously with the Vienna performances at the Stadt-Theaters of Hamburg and of Leipzig.

At a recent Concert of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna the first performance of an overture to an opera by Franz Schubert, entitled "Des Teufel's Lustschloss," created much interest. The work was composed, to a libretto by Kotzebue, between the years 1813-14, when the composer was still almost a boy, and has never been printed. The first and third acts are said to be still in existence, the manuscript of the second having served to light the fire at the house of a friend of the composer. The overture is described as being sprightly and of sound workmanship.

The museum of the Mozart Institution at Salzburg has been enriched by the gift, on the part of the widow of M. Erard, of the ring given to the composer in 1762 by the Empress Maria Theresa, on the occasion of a concert held at Schönbrunn. The valuable relic had come into the possession of the lady through Spontini.

We have good authority for contradicting the report spread in German journals, and reproduced in these columns, to the effect that Herr Julius Stockhausen is about to resume his former position as director of the Stern'sche Gesangverein at Berlin. On the contrary, the great German baritone, although he has resigned his position as professor at the Frankfurt Conservatorium, intends to continue his residence in that town, where there is a sufficient field for the exercise of his eminent talents. Herr Max Bruch, the present director of the Berlin institution, publicly renounces, on the other hand, the intention attributed to him of resigning a position which he has so recently assumed.

The Berlin music journal Echo, occasionally quoted by us, has ceased to exist since the commencement of the present year.

A new work from the pen of Dr. Ludwig Nohl, "Mozart nach den Schilderungen seiner Zeitgenossen" (Mozart as described by his Contemporaries), is being issued in numbers by the firm of F. Thiel at Leipzig. The book will form a pendant to the same author's similar work on Beethoven (not the biography). We shall again refer to the new publication when complete.

Herr Josef Joachim is just now engaged upon a most successful Concert-tour extending over Austria and some parts of Italy, in conjunction with the Viennese pianist Herr Bonawitz. At Milan, where the two artists appeared on the 6th of last month and on subsequent dates, their reception has been of the most enthusiastic kind, the eminent violinist creating a furore with his Hungarian Concerto and the Hungarian dances, well known to London audiences.

Anton Rubinstein's operas are evidently gaining ground in the répertoires of continental theatres. At Berlin "Die Maccabäer" and "Ferramors" have been mounted; at Prague and Breslau the former work is being produced; at Hamburg "Nero" continues to draw a full house; the same may be said of "Ferramors" at the theatres of Königsberg and Dantzic; while at Moscow and St. Petersburg, where most of his operas have been long popular, a new work entitled "Kalaschnikoff" is shortly to be produced.

According to the Bayreuther Blätter the total amount realised by Dr. von Bülow, by his concerts given in aid of the fund of the Society of Patrons of the Bayreuth undertaking, amounted during the years 1878 and 1879 to 16,817 marks. The total receipts of the Society during the period named were about 88,000 marks.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann, to whose present artistic tour in various parts of Germany we specially referred in our last issue, has added considerably to her continental reputation during the past month. The gifted lady-pianist appeared twice at the famous Gewandhaus Concerts of Leipzig, where her interpretations, especially of the music of Bach, met with the most unqualified approbation, the same flattering reception being accorded her during her subsequent visits to Halle, Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Darmstadt (where she had the honour of playing before the Court), and elsewhere. Miss Zimmermann is expected to return to this country during the present month.

Ignaz Brüll's new opera, "Bianca," has recently been produced at the Hoftheater of Dresden, with but slight success. The work has survived only three or four representations, notwithstanding Frau Schuch-Proska's excellent singing in the principal rôle.

At the Paris Opéra-Comique a one-act opera by Nicolo, a young aspirant for fame, has met with decided success. New operatic works are expected from the pen of M. Joncières, for whom M. Louis Gallet is said to have written a libretto, as well as from M. Gounod, who has accepted the book of an opera, entitled "Henri VIII.," of which M. Détroyat is the author. Before, however, the popular French composer can commence the new composition, he will have to complete his "Héloise et Abelard," effect the radical changes in the score of his "Tribut de Zamora," and remodel the third act of "Cinq-Mars," according to his announced intentions.

M. Gevaert, the director of the Brussels Conservatoire, is engaged upon the composition of an opera entitled "Venise," for which M. Sardou has written the libretto.

The opening Concert of the present season of the "Stefano Tempia Choral Society," of Turin, was dedicated exclusively to compositions by the founder, who died in November, 1879. Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" will shortly be produced by the same Society for the first time on Italian soil.

A grand Music Festival is to be held at Rome next Easter on the occasion of the inauguration in the Eternal City of a statue of Palestrina. Among the composers of eminence who have been invited to contribute compositions are mentioned: Signori Ponchielli, Marchetti, Bazzini, Pedrotto, Gamboti, and Rossi, MM. Thomas and Gounod, and Herren Wagner and Liszt. Verdi has likewise promised a composition from his pen.

A festival in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence will be held this year at Brussels, preparations on a grand scale having already been made. A hall capable of holding some 6,000 persons is being erected, where musical performances will take place during three successive days, the first being devoted to old Belgian masters, the third to solo performances and modern Belgian composers, while on the second the choral societies of Antwerp will unite in concert.

An interesting Concert was given on December 23 by the Brussels Conservatoire, when the programme consisted exclusively of compositions emanating from the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, executed or accompanied on such instruments as were actually in use at those periods. The Brussels institution, as is well known, boasts the possession of an exceptionally fine and complete collection of musical instruments, both ancient and modern.

It is stated in Italian journals that Verdi has just set to music a "Paternoster" and an "Ave" to Dante's words, and that they will be produced at Milan during next Carnival, on condition that the proceeds are expended on local charities

Richard Wagner is at present staying at Naples, where he will probably remain some months. His health is said to be daily improving. During his stay "Lohengrin" will most likely be produced at the Naples Theatre.

Madame Christine Nilsson continues to electrify the Madrid public with her impersonations of the heroines of Gounod's "Faust" and Thomas's "Mignon." Regarding the latter, a correspondent of Le Ménestrel writes to that journal: "The plaudits and recalls succeeded one another almost without interruption, during the first three representations which have so far taken place." It is to be hoped that there were none amongst the audience who had come with a desire to hear the opera itself, for they must have been sadly disappointed otherwise! This is about as good an illustration of the tyranny exercised by the modern diva-worship as we have yet heard of.

An opera entitled "Don Bibas" will before long be brought out at the Lisbon Theatre. The composer is an amateur, the Visconde d'Arneiro, whose name has already become known by the production, at the same theatre, of his operatic work "L' Elisire di Giovanezza."

Ernst Kossak, for many years one of the most highly esteemed humoristic writers, and an able critic in art matters in connection with Berlin journalism, died on the 3rd ult.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (December 28): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Adagio and Rondo for violin (Max Bruch); Orchestral Fragments from "Manfred" (Schumann); Variations for two pianofortes on a Theme by Beethoven (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "Oberon" (Weber). Conservatoire Concert (January 4): Symphony, A minor (Mendelssohn); Chorus, "La Mort d'Ophélie" (Berlioz); Fragments from "Egmont" (Beethoven); Chorus, "Près du fleuve étranger" (Gounod). CORRESPONDENCE.

ENGLISH VERSION OF THE TEXT OF "ELIJAH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with great interest the articles in "THE MUSICAL TIMES" entitled "The Great Composers," and shall be grateful if you will allow me to ask a question on a subject referred to in the January number.

I allude to the composition of "Elijah," and I am anxious to know on good authority at what period of his work Mendelssohn first dealt with the English words.

No doubt "Pastor Schubring" delivered his views in the German, but as the oratorio was first produced in England it would seem probable that Mendelssohn was at least acquainted with the translation before the finishing touches were put to the music, and it would be gratifying to be assured of it.

But if this was not the case, and if Mendelssohn never took our English version into consideration, I am afraid we ought to consider that we have not got the oratorio in its best and truest form, it being generally admitted that all vocal music loses somewhat by any alteration of the original words. This would be a hard lesson for us to learn, now that the "Elijah" has become so interwoven with our English musical life.—Your obedient servant,

J. E. A. T.

P.S.—It would be interesting to have similar information about other great Oratorios, e.g.: "St. Paul," "Lobgesang," &c.

[Mendelssohn's published correspondence contains no reference whatever to the English version of the text of "Elijah," nor, as far as we know, is the subject of our correspondent's letter touched upon by any of the master's biographers or critics. There is every reason for believing that the music was composed to the German words; which alone appear in the full score (now in the possession of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.), used by Dr. Gauntlett, the organist at Birmingham, in 1846. The fact that this, the first performance, was given in English; further, that it was conducted by the composer, and that he made very considerable alterations after this, but previous to publication, makes it appear probable that the English words at least received very careful consideration. All the alterations made in the vocal music to suit the English text can be seen and compared with the original in the first edition of the oratorio, published by the late firm of Ewer and Co. If our correspondent can induce Mrs. Bartholomew to gratify his natural curiosity upon this matter he will do musicians generally a service.—ED. Musical Times.]

THE CAMBRIDGE EXAMINATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The letter in your last issue is evidently the language of disappointed chagrin. Though the writer signs himself "Mus. Bac.," he does not put Oxon. or Cantab. after it, and it is just possible that he may be one of the unfortunates "plucked" at an early stage, and afterwards successful either at Heidelberg, New York, or Dublin. A man who had gained his degree at Cambridge would not so write of his Alma Mater: indeed, he would certainly have been proud to put "Cantab." after his name. If his degree is equal to a Cambridge one, it is unwise of him to wish to lower the standard, and so lessen the value of his own degree. And if he has obtained his degree at Oxford or Cambridge, as very many have done, surely "What man has done, man can do"; and if so many fail, it is because they are not up to the standard, and therefore not worthy of the honour. It must be borne in mind that nearly all who have gone to Cambridge during the last two years have been over thirty years of age, hoping to get in under old regulations. Many would be very doubtful about passing, but would take their chance of just scraping through the Preliminary Examination somehow, and if they did so, would very likely go no further. It is questionable whether half who even passed the Preliminary Examination sent up Exercises this year, and some of those who would send the exercise might not be ready for the final examination at once; so that the statistics of "Mus. Bac." require modification and verification. The Examiners should be credited with having weeded out some men who would have added no honour to the title.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

January, 1880. A MUS. BAC. OF THE FUTURE.

"THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As the letter-press of your valuable paper cannot be had after publication, would you allow me to suggest that the above-named papers be reprinted in book form, of so many volumes, when completed.

Thus far I have read them with great interest, especially those on Beethoven and the present numbers on Mendelssohn.

I hope Mr. Bennett will not stay his hand yet, but will tell us something about Bach, Cherubini, Chopin, Gluck, Handel, Moscheles, Schubert, Spohr, &c.

Many thanks are due to Mr. Bennett for the very valuable service he has rendered the profession, by bringing to the front in these exceedingly interesting articles many new beauties in the lives of the Great Composers. I inclose my card, and remain,

Yours faithfully,

York, January 6, 1880. G. H. S.

[We understand that what our correspondent proposes is about to be done, and that a first volume will be issued in the course of a few months.—ED. Musical Times.]

MOZART'S TWELFTH MASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On what authority is the Mass commonly known as Mozart's No. 12 now so often ascribed to Zellner? Did he really write it? Who was he? The Mass is the most popular of all those attributed to Mozart, and it would interest all musicians to be satisfied as to its real authorship.—I am, &c.,

Fosco.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

HENRY C. LAYTON.—The letter of our correspondent merely re-states the derivation of the Chromatic Scale as propounded by Professor Macfarren.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANGOR.—A very successful Concert was given by the Choral Society on the 20th ult., in the Penrhyn Hall, before a large audience. The glee-singing by the Society reflected great credit upon the Conductor, Mr. W Williams. Songs were effectively sung by Miss Nellie Arthur, Messrs. Eos Maelor, E. M. Jones, and A. McCall, the last-named gentleman acting as substitute for Mr. Cecil Tovey, who was seriously indisposed. Mr. E. W. Thomas was an efficient accompanist.

BIRMINGHAM.—The annual performance of the Messiah by the Festival Choral Society, took place in the Town Hall on the evening of Boxing-Day, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Robert Hilton, as vocal principals; Mr. Gilmer, cornet, replacing Mr. Thomas Harper, absent; Mr. Stimpson at the organ, and Mr. Stockley conducting. There was a very large attendance, and the performance was an exceedingly good one, reflecting the highest credit upon principals, band, and chorus.——The members of the Philharmonic Union gave their Christmas Concert the following evening, the programme comprising The Woman of Samaria (W. S. Bennett), and a miscellaneous selection. The principal work received a very meritorious rendition, and was highly appreciated; the vocal principals, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Clelland, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Frith doing justice to the solos, and also to the beautiful quartet "God is a Spirit," which was strenuously redemanded but not repeated. A noticeable feature of the second part was the performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, by Master Frank Watkis, a juvenile pupil of Dr. Heap, who displayed high qualities as an executant. A Second Concert Overture by Dr. Heap, a decided advance upon the first, met with a warm reception, and a new song, "Annabel Lee," well sung by Mr. Maas, created a marked effect. Both works may be classed among Dr. Heap's happiest efforts. There was an overflowing and enthusiastic audience.——Messrs. Harrison's Third Subscription Popular Concert took place in the Town Hall on Wednesday, the 21st ult. The artists included members of Mr. Mapleson's company, but an apology had to be made for Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, who was unable to appear through illness. Madame Marie Roze, Mdlle. Darialli, Signor Tecchi, Mr. Carleton, and Signor Susini, went through a miscellaneous programme which gave great satisfaction. Mr. Carleton made a highly favourable impression on this his first appearance at Birmingham. Mdlle. Sacconi gave several harp solos in a very finished manner. Dr. von Bülow, who made his first appearance in the Town Hall on this occasion, played, among other pieces, the Menuetta e Fughetta, from Rheinberger's Op. 113, for left hand alone, and created a decided sensation. Professor Hill, the husband of Ilma di Murska, proved himself an admirable Conductor and accompanist. There was, as usual, a large and brilliant audience.——The Saturday Evening Popular Concerts continue to meet with extraordinary success. On every occasion numbers are unable to obtain admission to the hall. The last few have been of a miscellaneous character, the artists being Miss Symper and Miss Walker (local students at the South Kensington School), pianists; Miss Blower (another local student), Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. Whiston, and Mr. Harrison, vocalists; Mr. F. Ward, violinist; and Mr. Bickley's Glee Party, whose efforts were most successful.——On the 17th ult., Mr. Stockley's band gave an Orchestral Concert, with Miss Anna Schauenberg as vocalist, the performance giving the highest satisfaction to a large audience.

Birstall, near Leeds.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their Annual Subscription Concert in the Assembly Room, Low Lane, on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., when Handel's Oratorio Jephtha was performed, the principal parts being ably sustained by Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Miss Marian Tomlinson, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Walter Dealtry. The band and chorus, which numbers upwards of eighty performers, was well balanced, and the manner in which the choruses were rendered reflected great credit on all concerned. Mr. George Crawshaw conducted, and discharged his duties in a most efficient manner.

Bognor.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Concert on the 30th of December. Part I. consisted of the First Part of Handel's Messiah, and Part II. was miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Miss Alice Osmond, Madame Wissmuller, Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. The Concert was a thorough success, and the singing of the choruses and part songs reflected the greatest credit on Mr. T. E. Aylward (organist of Chichester Cathedral), the Conductor of the Society. The soloists were thoroughly efficient. Mr. G. Osmond presided at the piano, and Mr. W. Packham at the harmonium.

Bonchurch, I.W.—A very successful Concert was given on December 29, at the Bonchurch Hotel, by the members of Mr. Banson's newly formed Musical Society. A selection from Haydn's First Mass, and several part-songs, including Barnby's "Lullaby" and J. G. Callcott's "The lark now leaves his wat'ry nest," were given by the choir. The solo vocal music, rendered by Miss Scriven, Mr. Cotsford Dick, and the Rev. Arthur Sewell, included the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" (with violin and harmonium obbligato), Gounod's Nazareth (with harmonium obbligato and male chorus), Gounod's Serenade, &c. Mr. Charles Fletcher was solo violinist, and played Raff's Cavatina, Vieuxtemps' Fantaisie Caprice, and two movements from De Beriot's Seventh Concerto. Mr. Banson conducted, and played Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses (No. 17). The audience was large and thoroughly appreciative.

Bournemouth.—On the 15th ult. a successful Organ Recital was given at the Richmond Hill Church, on the new instrument recently erected by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield. The selection included Batiste's Andante and Variations in G, a Prelude and Fugue by Bach, an Offertoire by Wely, and an original composition. Mr. Mansell Ramsey, the organist, presided at the instrument, and a vote of thanks was accorded to him at the close of the performance.

Bradford.—The fourth of the current season of Subscription Concerts took place in St. George's Hall on Friday, the 16th ult., when an excellent programme of chamber music was selected. The artists were Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Spielmann, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti, who formed the string quartet; Dr. von Bülow, pianist, and Mdlle. Lallemant, vocalist. Mr. Midgley was an able accompanist.

Bristol.—Mr. Augustus Simmons, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church, gave his annual benefit Concert in St. Joseph's Hall, Trenchard Street, on the 20th ult. The principal vocalists were Madame Bretelle, Madame Nicholas, Miss Kate Hayes, Mr. E. T. Morgan, Mr. Stuart Higgs, and Mr. George Williams. The anthem, "Glory, honour, praise, and power" (Mozart), which is very rarely performed, amply proved the excellent and careful training the choir had received. The solo vocalists in this piece were Madame Bretelle, Miss Hayes, and Messrs. Morgan and Higgs. The organ accompaniment was excellently played. The trio, "On Thee each living soul awaits," by Madame Nicholas and Messrs. Morgan and Higgs, the recitative and solo, "And God created man," and "In native worth," by Mr. Morgan, and "With verdure clad," by Madame Bretelle, were warmly applauded. Mr. Augustus Simmons conducted. Mr. Dinelli Skelding presided at the organ and pianoforte; his skill as an organist being specially displayed in accompanying the solo "With verdure clad," and the air, "Angels ever bright and fair."

Cape Town.—A Service of Praise, the last of the series of opening services in connection with the Metropolitan Wesleyan Methodist Church, was held on Wednesday evening, December 10. The Hon. Wm. Ayliff, Secretary for Native Affairs, presided. The programme consisted of selections from the Messiah and Creation, with anthems, &c., which were effectively rendered by the choir of the church, under the able leadership of Mr. J. H. Ashley. Mrs. Jansen rendered valuable assistance by her admirable singing of "With verdure clad," "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and the solo in "The marvellous work." Mr. Bowley was heard to great advantage in "Comfort ye" and "In native worth." The powers of the fine-toned organ were well brought out by the organist, Mr. J. B. Smithers.

Catford.—The new and handsome church of St. George, Perry Hill, built at the sole cost of H. Parker, Esq., J.P. of Lee, Kent, was consecrated on Saturday, the 17th ult., by his Grace the Lord Bishop of Rochester. In the processional hymn, "Onward, Christian soldiers," the choir, ably led by Mr. W. H. Cooke, the precentor and choirmaster, sang with great effect. The Service was sung to Stainer's arrangement of the Parisian tones, and was admirably rendered.

Cheltenham. — Mr. J. A. Matthews's Choral Society gave the second Concert of the tenth season on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult. The Messiah was the Oratorio performed. The band and chorus numbered upwards of 150 performers. The solos were well rendered by Madame Beesley, Miss Eva Neate (a pupil of Mr. Matthews), Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Orlando Christian. The minor parts were sustained very effectively by members of the Society, and the whole performance was most successful. Mr. J. A. Matthews conducted.

Clifton.—On Thursday, the 15th ult., the members of the Bristol Madrigal Society gave their annual ladies' night at the Victoria Rooms, when the spacious and elegant saloon was completely filled. The choir mustered in good numbers, and it was evident that great care had been taken in balancing the parts in each work rendered, about thirty boys taking the treble parts. The programme was an excellent one, and included Wilbye's "Sweet honey-sucking bees," and "The Lady Oriana"; Bateson's "Have I found her?" Morley's "Now is the month of maying," and "In dew of roses"; Weelkes's "When Thoralis delights"; Gibbons's "Silver swan," and Linley's "Let me, careless." Of modern compositions, those which were received with most enthusiasm were Leslie's "Lullaby of life"; Smart's "O say not that my heart is cold"; W. Macfarren's hunting-song "Up, up! ye dames"; Benedict's "Home," and Sir George Elvey's "Softly, softly blow," each of which had to be repeated. Sir George Elvey was present, and received a most gratifying round of long-continued applause after the performance of his part-song. The other modern composers whose works were selected from were Mendelssohn, John Barnett, Samuel Reay, and R. L. de Pearsall, his madrigal "Light of my soul," and his ballad-dialogue in ten parts, "Sir Patrick Spens" being given most charmingly; the latter having to be repeated. Saville's "Waits," as usual, brought the concert to a close. Mr. Daniel W. Rootham conducted.

Dolgelly.—At the recent Eisteddfodd (which has now reached its seventh year) Mr. Brinley Richards, who was adjudicator on the musical competitions, delivered an eloquent address on the history of these national meetings, and afterwards took part in the evening Concert. Several prizes were given, both for choral and solo singing, and much talent was exhibited on the occasion.

Dover.—The third Concert of the Dover Catch Club was given on Thursday, the 8th ult., under the direction of W. Gorton, Esq., when a well-arranged programme was most successfully carried out by the following artists: Miss Rose Barnby, R.A.M., Madame San Martino-Campobello, Mr. Lovett King, and Mr. Prenton. The hall was well filled by a highly appreciative audience.

Downham Market. — The Philharmonic Society gave the first Concert of the seventh season in the Public Hall, on Thursday evening, the 22nd ult. The first part consisted of a selection from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, the principal vocalists being Miss Berrie Stephens, Mrs. W. Pope, and Messrs. Withers, Mawrey, Casebow, and G. Read. The choruses were sung with steadiness and precision. Haydn's No. 1. Symphony (Salomon Set), Glinka's Polonaise with chorus, Kalliwoda's Valse Brillante, for two violins, were the principal items in the second part. Much praise is due to the band under the leadership of Mr. J. Bray, of Lynn.

Edinburgh.—The sixth of the series of Concerts in connection with the Choral Union took place on the 12th ult., when the Music Hall was filled in every part. The orchestra was under the direction of Mr. Manns. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Rose Trevor, a young lady who on this occasion made her first appearance at a public concert; and the solo instrumentalist was Mr. George Magrath. The orchestral numbers comprised Ambroise Thomas's Raymond overture, which was finely played, and the closing and principal number in the first part of the Concert was the only Symphony (in F, Op. 9) of Hermann Goetz, the Königsberg composer who died, yet young, three years ago, just when his genius was beginning to compel recognition. In the second part the orchestra played, very efficiently, Dr. Arthur Sullivan's picturesque incidental music to Henry VIII., and Wagner's Tannhäuser overture. Mr. Magrath, whose powers as a pianist are well known in Edinburgh, took, in the first part of the Concert, the solo instrument in two movements from Chopin's No. 1 Concerto in E, and in the second part two numbers by Liszt—a tender and impassioned Gondoliera, and the Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2.——Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital on the 15th ult., in the Music-Class-room, to a crowded audience, the attendance of students being again very large. Bach's Motet was played chiefly on the diapasons, with the alternations and antiphonal effects of a double choir. In the Handel selection, beginning with the contralto air, "Return, O God of Hosts," the most effective and warmly appreciated portion was the Funeral March (Samson), which was given on a mixture of stops in imitation of the trombones in Handel's score. Mozart's "Gloria" concluded with the full power of the organ, and a demand for its repetition was partly complied with. The Menuetto and Trio from Sterndale Bennett's G Minor Symphony was an excellent specimen of the style of the first English composer of modern times; and the Louis XV. Gavotte—so brimful of humour—was loudly encored, but not repeated.

ENNISKILLEN.—Mr. Arnold's fourth Concert was given on Friday evening, the 16th ult., before a large audience in the Town Hall. Miss Macdonald was very successful in all her songs. Mr. Arthur Fowles was encored in "Rolling in foaming billows" (Creation), and Mr. W. C. Trimble and Mr. James Plews were also highly appreciated. The church choir sang several concerted pieces during the evening, including "Hail, smiling morn" (Spofforth), encored; "Here in cool grot" (Mornington); "The Hardy Norseman" (Pearsall), and "The Nightingale" (Mendelssohn), unaccompanied. Mr. Arnold presided at the organ-harmonium and pianoforte.

EPPING.—On Wednesday, the 21st ult., an Entertainment was given in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. Walter Latter, R.A.M. The vocalists were Mrs. Latter, Mrs. Sinclair, Miss Elsa Odell, Mr. Arthur Hooper, and Mr. Waters. The overtures, Semiramide and Euryanthe, by Miss Odell and Miss Gatrill, were evidently much appreciated. Amongst the most effective vocal pieces were Miss Elsa Odell's "Forget-me-not" (Ganz), and "The old, old story" (Blumenthal); the duet, "The sailor sighs" (Balfe), sung by Miss E. Odell and Mr. Arthur Hooper; "The death of Nelson" and "The Bay of Biscay" by Mr. Arthur Hooper; "The midshipmite" and "The three sailor boys" by Mr. Waters, several of which were encored.

ERITH.—Mr. Richard Lemaire gave his annual evening Concert at the Public Hall, on the 20th ult. The artists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Emily Dones, and Messrs. Henry Guy and Bridson, and the solo violinist Miss Lucy Riley. There was a large and fashionable audience, and the programme, which consisted chiefly of ballads, &c., was much appreciated. Miss Riley was recalled after each of her two solos, her playing being extremely good for so youthful an artist. Mr. G. E. Blunden and Mr. Lemaire conducted.

FULHAM.—A Concert in connection with the All Saints' Church Building Fund was given at the Lecture Hall, on December 29, a pleasing programme being excellently rendered by the Misses Laumann, Miss Emily Paget, Mr. Theo Marzials, Miss Jessie Percivall (a talented pianist), Mr. J. Munro Coward, Mr. Charles Morgan, and others. Miss Emily Paget gave with much expression and refinement of style, Dudley Buck's song "When the heart is young," and Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," besides joining in a Christmas Carol (by C. J. Laumann), with Miss Laumann and Mr. Morgan, Smart's glee "Rest thee on this mossy pillow," and Balfe's duet "Trust her not," with Miss Percivall, which proved one of the most successful items of the evening. Miss Laumann was encored for her able rendering of Henriette's "Always alone," and was warmly applauded after a song, "Christe Eleison," by J. Munro Coward, a gentleman whose executive abilities were subsequently displayed in a solo on the Mustel organ from Carmen. Mr. Theo Marzials was encored in his own "Three sailor boys"; and a like compliment was awarded to Mr. Charles Morgan for his singing of Balfe's "As I'd nothing else to do." Miss Cornelia Laumann's solo on the American organ, "Les veilleurs de nuit," Miss Jessie Percivall's brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, and a selection from H.M.S. Pinafore (arranged by Mr. J. M. Coward), were among the other leading features of a most agreeable entertainment, which was numerously attended.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The Oratorio Concert given in Christ Church in December was a most pronounced success. The programme was one of particular interest, the works chosen for representation being Rossini's Stabat Mater, and an excellent selection from the works of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Gounod, &c. Great praise is due to Mr. Colbeck and his colleagues for the labours they have undergone in their earnest endeavour to place the compositions worthily before the inhabitants of this city. The choruses went well, and the solos and concerted pieces were rendered with exceptional skill. Mr. E. Rake presided at the pianoforte, Mr. W. R. Colbeck at the organ, and Mr. P. Hemery conducted.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—On Tuesday, December 9, Mrs. Adamson and Mr. Aldous gave their Second Concert, in the school-room of St. Thomas' Church. The programme was well selected, and included the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Third Sonata for violin and piano; the Andante, Minuet, and Trio from Mozart's Thirteenth String Quartet; Randegger's "Slumber Song," with accompaniment for piano, two violas, and two violoncellos; Gounod's Hymn to St. Cecilia, for violin, piano, and harmonium; the Andante from Mendelssohn's Trio, Op. 66; and Guilmant's Pastorale, for piano and harmonium.

HANLEY, STAFFORDSHIRE.—On the 8th ult., the Members of the Hanley and Shelton Philharmonic Society gave their second annual performance of the Messiah in the Imperial Circus. The large building (which will accommodate about 3,000 persons) was full in every part, and the performance was in every respect excellent. The solos were sung by Miss Mary Davies, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. William Shakespeare, and Mr. Thurley Beale, the band being composed of professional players from Birmingham, local professionals, and selected amateurs of the district; Mr. F. Ward, of Birmingham, leader. The band and chorus made up a total of 250 performers, under Mr. F. Mountford, the Conductor of the Society, to whose careful training the present efficiency of the choir is due.

HEELEY, SHEFFIELD.—On New Year's Eve the members of the Heeley Harmonic Society gave their second Invitation Concert this season in Oak Street Chapel, when the Messiah was performed. The solos were creditably rendered by members of the Society, and the choruses on the whole were well given. The band, also mainly composed of members of the Society, rendered very efficient aid, being ably led by Mr. S. Seaton, vice-president. Mr. J. A. Ludlam presided at the organ, and Mr. William Chapman conducted. The Society was established in September, 1878, and is entirely supported by the gentry of Heeley and its members, and so far has been very successful. Much credit is due to the hon. secretary, Mr. C. J. Cowlishaer, and the president, Mr. Councillor Booker, for their interest in the Society's welfare.——The Annual Tea Meeting in connection with the United Methodist Free Church Sunday School was held on Saturday evening, the 3rd ult. After tea a public meeting was held, presided over by the Rev. J. Adcock. Addresses were given by the Revs. R. Brewin, W. Redfern, Mr. P. Dawkins, and Mr. J. Wostenholme. During the evening the choir sang a choice selection of carols, songs, &c., accompanied on the pianoforte by the organist, Mr. J. A. Ludlam, to whom was presented a very chaste tea and coffee service, in recognition of the cheerful and valuable services he has rendered as organist and choirmaster. The presentation was made by Mr. Weston, in a brief but telling speech, on behalf of the teachers and friends of the Sunday School.

HERNE BAY.—On Sunday, the 18th ult., a new Organ was opened at the Congregational Church, by Mr. W. N. Twelvetrees, deputy-organist of the City Temple, London.

HORSHAM.—An Organ Recital was given at St. Mary's Church on the 2nd ult. by Mr. Alfred J. Eyre, R.A.M., Organist of St. Peter's, Vauxhall, before a large audience. Where every piece in the programme was so good, it is difficult to give the preference to any particular one; but those which seemed to give the greatest satisfaction to the audience were the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony in D, Smart's Fantasia with Choral in G, and the plaintive air, Giordani's "Caro mio ben." We might also specially mention the performance of Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, and the first movement of Schumann's Symphony in B flat. The Recital was listened to throughout by a most attentive audience.

HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING, DURHAM.—On Thursday, the 1st ult., the members of the Houghton-le-Spring Choral Society gave their annual performance of the Messiah in the Wesleyan Chapel, which was filled to overflowing. The vocalists were Mrs. Shepherd, Mr. Leatham, Mr. D. Whitehead, and Mr. Grice, of the Durham Cathedral choir. Leader of the band, Mr. Ferry; Organist, Mr. G. Rennie; Conductor, Mr. W. Preston. The performance throughout was most praiseworthy, many of the numbers being redemanded.

IPSWICH.—A fine performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus was given in the Town Hall on the 8th ult. Mr. Lindley Nunn conducted. The solo parts were most ably sustained by Miss H. Nunn, Miss Butterworth, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Hilton. The choruses were efficiently rendered.

LEICESTER.—The New Choral Society gave in the Temperance Hall, on December 30, a performance of Handel's Messiah, in the presence of a crowded audience, all parts of the spacious hall being well filled. The solos were taken by Miss A. Birch, Miss L. Shaw, Miss Clowes, Mr. J. Jackson, Mr. A. Joll, and Mr. R. C. Allen. In "The trumpet shall sound," the trumpet part was well played by Mr. G. Lawrence. The choruses were sung with great spirit, general accuracy, and good effect. Mr. Kilby was the leading violin, and Mr. H. B. Ellis rendered valuable assistance at the harmonium. Mr. Hancock conducted.

LEWISHAM.—A special Musical Service was held in St. Stephen's Church on Tuesday evening the 6th ult., when the following instrumental and vocal music was well rendered: Organ Solo, Allegro (E. H. Turpin); Te Deum (Berthold Tours); Organ Solo, Andante (H. Smart); Epiphany Carol, "The first Nowell"; Solo and Chorus, Nazareth (C. Gounod); Organ Solo, Allegretto Pastorale (Warwick Jordan); Chorus, "There shall a star" (Mendelssohn); Organ Solo, Grand March (Boyton Smith); Carol, "Jacob's ladder"; Offertory Hymn, "As with gladness"; Finale, Postlude (C. J. Frost). Mr. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Fell. Coll. Org., &c., presided at the organ.

LIMERICK.—A very successful Concert was given by Mr. M'Guckin at the Athenæum, on the 10th ult., before a large audience. A duet for violin and piano was well played by Mons. Claude Jacquinot (violin) and Mr. Oliver King (piano). The artists were warmly applauded, and responded to an unanimous encore. Mr. Ludwig, who is a great favourite with the musical public here, sang in his best style. Mr. M'Guckin made a very good impression, and was more than once recalled. The other artists were Miss Dalton and Miss Lyar.——On the 13th ult. Mr. Mapleson's company gave a grand vocal and instrumental Concert, which was most successful, the theatre being crowded to excess. The artists were Madame Ilma di Murska and Mr. Carleton (who made their début before a Limerick audience), Mdme. Marie Roze, and Signor Tecchi, all of whom were received with great enthusiasm. Mdlle. Sacconi's harp-playing was highly appreciated. Professor Hill conducted, and played the accompaniments in a most artistic style.

LLANDAFF.—The members of the Madrigal Society gave their third annual Ladies' Night on the 9th ult. There was, as usual, a crowded room, and several members of Gloucester, Bristol, Hereford, Worcester, and Llandaff Cathedral Choirs gave valuable assistance to the Society. The older madrigal writers were represented in the programme by Douland, Morley, Gastoldi, Gibbons, and Saville; the more modern composers by Pearsall, Walmisley, Mendelssohn, Leslie, and Hatton. A new part-song, written for the Society by the Organist of Llandaff Cathedral, was admirably sung and received with much enthusiasm by the large audience. Walmisley's "Sweete floweres"; Morley's "Fire, fire!" and Pearsall's "Why do the roses," were sung with an effect which only those thoroughly well-versed in the works of our grand old cathedral and madrigal writers know how to obtain.

LLANTRISANT.—A miscellaneous Concert, in aid of the Miskin Village Church Funds, was given in the National School-room on the 15th ult., when the following artists took part: Vocalists, Miss S. A. Williams, R.A.M., Miss M. Morgan, Mr. T. Williams, and Mr. E. J. Thomas; piano, Miss Holder; cornet, Mr. Geo. F. Martyn. The church choir (assisted by a small but efficient orchestra) rendered good service. Conductor, Mr. R. Lloyd Jones (Llwydmor).

LONG ASHTON.—The second of the series of winter entertainments took place on Monday evening, the 5th ult., at the Parochial Schools, when the large room was filled in every part. The first part of the programme consisted of The Song of the Months, by Francis Howell.

The solos were sung by Miss M. L. Gould, Miss Blackburne, Miss Gould, Mr. W. J. Kidner and Mr. J. Lukins. The chorus numbered about 40 voices. Miss Fry presided at the piano, and Mr. W. Skelding at the harmonium. The performance went with great smoothness and precision, and the chorus was at all times well together. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Miss E. Lewis, from the Royal Academy of Music, played a pianoforte solo, and Mr. Morgan, contributed valuable aid in the vocal music.

Manchester.—The programme at Mr. Hallé's tenth Concert of the season, on the 2nd ult., consisted of Félicien David's The Desert, Ode-Symphony for orchestra and male chorus with tenor solos, recitatives by Mr. G. H. Tarbuck, and (for the first time) Brahms's Rinaldo, Cantata for tenor soli, male chorus and orchestra. Vocalist, Mr. Edward Lloyd, who sang with his accustomed ease and finish, but was evidently suffering from cold. The choruses in The Desert, were given very effectively; but Rinaldo had evidently not been sufficiently rehearsed.——At the seventh of Mr. E. de Jong's series of Popular Concerts, on the 3rd ult., the vocalists were Madame Emma Beasley and Mr. Joseph Maas. Solo euphonium, Mr. Moss; accompanist, Mr. J. W. Collinson. No doubt the large and enthusiastic audience was attracted principally to listen to Mr. Joseph Maas, who seems to become more and more a favourite, and deservedly so, every time we hear him. His rendering of Balfe's "Then you'll remember me," was indeed a treat. Mr. Moss played a solo on the euphonium with great taste and precision.——Mr. Hallé's eleventh Concert of the season took place on the 8th ult. Vocalist, Madame Ilma di Murska; solo violin, Madame Norman-Néruda; pianoforte, Mr. Charles Hallé. The singing of Madame Ilma di Murska was highly finished, but we are sorry to say her voice shows signs of wear. Madame Norman-Néruda, if possible, surpassed herself. Her phrasing in the Kreutzer Sonata was excellent, and with Mr. Hallé at the pianoforte, nothing more could be desired.——The members of the Manchester Vocal Society gave their fourth Subscription Concert on the 14th ult., when Spohr's Vocal Mass was given with great effect. This being their second performance of the same work, all seemed more familiar with the difficult parts. Mr. Whittaker's fine voice told well in the bass solo of Costa's Date Sonitum, which concluded the first part. The second part consisted principally of Trios and Part-Songs; all of which were given in excellent style.——The twelfth Concert of Mr. Hallé's series, took place on the 15th ult. Vocalist, Miss Minnie Hauk (her first appearance at these concerts), who created a marked effect by her singing of Weber's "Come una volta." Mr. Hallé played Schumann's Concertstück (first time), with his accustomed vigour, and the band performed Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in the usual excellent manner.——At M. de Jong's eighth Concert, on the 17th ult., the vocalists were Madame Trebelli, Mrs. Osgood, Mr. Shakespeare, and Signor Zoboli: solo violin, M. Ovide Musin. With such a host of talent a good attendance was ensured. The programme consisted principally of English songs; Madame Trebelli's rendering of "Rule Britannia," and Mrs. Osgood's "Rose softly blooming" (Spohr), were especially good.——Mr. Hallé's thirteenth Concert took place on the 22nd ult., the performance consisting of Gluck's grand Opera, Orpheus, with Madame Patey, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, and Miss Mary Davies as principal vocalists; the band and chorus numbering 350 performers. The work was well done throughout, and altogether the Concert was most enjoyable.——A very interesting series of Concerts are being given, on Saturday evenings, for workpeople at the Hulme Town Hall, under the presidency of the Bishop of Manchester, with Mr. S. Jacoby as Musical Director. Several ladies and gentlemen (amateur) have rendered most valuable assistance, kindly giving their services, both vocal and instrumental, which, together with the clever violin solos of the talented conductor, have attracted very large audiences—in fact, hundreds are unable to find accommodation. We wish every success to this praiseworthy undertaking, which, no doubt, will produce highly beneficial results.

Norwich.—There was a large attendance at Messrs. Noverre's Rooms on the occasion of the Concert given by the choristers of Norwich Cathedral, on the 2nd ult. Among the audience was the Very Rev. the Dean of Norwich. The principal item of attraction was the first production in Norwich of Dr. Stainer's sacred Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus. The performance was especially creditable to all concerned, and must have been very gratifying to the Cathedral organist, Dr. Gladstone, upon whom much earnest labour has devolved. The part-music, notably the quaint chorus, "The Wailing," sung entirely by the choristers, and the chorus, "Awake, thou that sleepest," was most faithfully and effectively rendered. The solos were well given by Mr. Minns, Master Cockaday, and Mr. W. N. Smith. The Cantata was accompanied on the pianoforte and harmonium by Mr. Meers and Mr. Flowers with considerable judgment and skill, and the introductory movements were also exceedingly well played. Dr. Gladstone was the Conductor. The first part of the Concert comprised a miscellaneous selection of Christmas pieces, chiefly part-music, all of which were interesting. The details of this admirable Concert were in the hands of the Precentor of Norwich Cathedral (the Rev. G. Willoughby Barrett), whose taste and judgment in musical matters it is a pleasure to acknowledge.

Ockley, Surrey.—Mr. Charles G. Sadler, Organist of the parish church, gave his fourth annual Concert on Monday evening, December 29th, in the School-room, assisted by Mr. W. H. Tibbalds (violin), the Choir of S. Margaret's, and several amateurs. Mr. Sadler played for his pianoforte solos, Wehli's Romance No. 2 in F, and J. S. Bach's Gavotte in G, and also joined Mr. Tibbalds in Haydn's Sonata No. 1 in G, for piano and violin, which was given with much expression. Miss Marian Piggot was highly successful in her singing of Braga's "Serenata" and Claribel's "Come back to Erin;" and Mr. Horsley Palmer's songs were also much appreciated. Mr. Sadler ably conducted.

Penzance.—A very successful performance of the Messiah was given in St. John's Hall on Tuesday evening, December 29. Mr. John H. Nunn, R.A.M., conducted. Miss Henrietta Nunn, pupil of Madame Bassano, sang the soprano solos, "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in a highly finished manner. The other soloists were Miss Hancock (London), Mr. M. Sampson, and Mr. A. L. Wills, both of Penzance. Miss L. M. Nunn, R.A.M., pupil of M. Sainton, was principal violin. Mr. R. White, jun., presided at the organ.

Perth.—The Euterpean Society, in conjunction with the body of instrumentalists known as the Glasgow Orchestra, gave a Concert on the 8th ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, which was magnificently rendered. Mr. Manns, of the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, conducted, the Euterpean Society having been trained by Mrs. Hempel to a very high state of efficiency. The instrumental part of the programme included Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (No. 5); Rhapsodie Ecossaise (A. C. Mackenzie); Selection from the Meistersinger (Wagner); Ballabile (Ponchielli); and Invitation pour la valse (Weber). In addition, Herr Hermann Franke played Vieuxtemps' Caprice, and Miss Hempel sang Mozart's "Voi che sapete." The Concert was a great success.

Putney.—A most successful Concert was given on the 19th ult., at the Assembly Rooms, by Mr. Frank Barnard, R.A.M., assisted by Messrs. T. Wingham, G. Palmer, W. Pettit, and W. H. Hann. The programme comprised the Kreutzer Sonata (Beethoven), Pianoforte Sonata, Maid of Orleans (Sterndale Bennett), and a Quartet for stringed instruments by the concert-giver. Mr. G. Palmer played Ernst's Violin Solo on Hungarian Airs. The vocalists were Miss Rose Stuart and Mr. Thurley Beale, the latter gaining an encore in a new song, "The Last Minstrel," by F. Barnard.

Redruth.—Mr. Heath's Choral Society gave a Concert on the 8th ult., which was well patronised. The first part consisted mainly of the Lay of the Bell (Romberg). Miss F. Moody, Mr. A. Taylor, and Mr. Orlando Christian were the solo vocalists. Mr. R. H. Heath conducted, and Miss Moody was an efficient accompanist.

Ryde.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Costa's Naaman, on the 15th ult., with great success. The vocalists were Madame A. Sutton, Miss Damian, Mr. S. Tower, and Mr. O. Christian. Leader, Mr. C. Gamblin. Mr. T. E. Aylward presided at the organ, and Mr. F. H. Simms conducted.

Settle, Yorkshire.—At a Concert given on the 2nd ult., some string quartets were excellently rendered by Messrs. J. Booth, C. W. Buck, H. M. Bower, and F. O. Bower, the most noticeable of which was Haydn's Hymn to the Emperor. A trio in E flat, by Beethoven, for violin, viola, and cello, accompanied by Miss Stansfeld on the pianoforte, was also remarkably well performed. Mr. F. O. Bower was encored for his rendering of a Largo and Allegro, in C minor, by Marcello. Some glees were well sung under the conductorship of Mr. Brewin, and Miss Ellis and Mr. Handby were very successful in their songs.

Sheffield.—A Concert was given at the Albert Hall on the 12th ult., which was fraught with more than usual interest to many of the numerous audience present, inasmuch as at it a new pianist made her first appearance in public. The débutante was Miss Eadon Bacon, the daughter of Mr. Stephen Bacon, one of Sheffield's prominent citizens. Miss Bacon (who is a medalist of the Royal Academy of Music) chose for her solos Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Diversion (No. 3), Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, Liszt's La Campanella, and O'Leary's arrangement of "There's nae luck aboot the hoose," in all of which she exhibited a perfectly trained touch and facile execution. The bénéficiaire was assisted in the instrumental department by Master Payne (a clever violinist from the Royal Academy of Music), and by the following vocalists: Miss Almina Hallowell, Miss Ellen Orridge, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Mr. C. T. Corke, R.A.M., officiated as accompanist.

Sidmouth.—On the 15th ult. the Choral Society gave another of their interesting Concerts, which was well attended. The programme contained a selection from Elijah, Mr. Rendle leading the small but efficient orchestra. A pianoforte solo by Mr. Fowler (Torquay) was much admired. After the Concert, Mr. H. A. Harding, B.Mus., Oxon., was presented by the Hon. the Lord Sidney Godolphin Osborne (Patron of the Society), with a handsome silver-mounted ivory bâton, as a mark of respect and gratitude for his abilities in conducting so successfully the Choral Society. The next concert is announced to take place in Easter week, when Mendelssohn's Christus will be performed.

Wellington, New Zealand.—The first Concert given in Wellington by Mr. Angelo Forrest, the newly arrived organist of St. Peter's Church, took place at the Athenæum with brilliant success. The hall was crowded in every part, and each of Mr. Forrest's performances elicited most enthusiastic applause. His playing was of the highest order of merit, and he is in every respect a worthy pupil of his master, Charles Hallé. Songs and duets were tastefully sung by Mrs. Greenwood, Mrs. Stuart, Miss Kennedy, Messrs. Page and Batten, the St. Peter's choir contributing some glees and choruses in very creditable style.——The first Subscription Concert of the Wellington Choral Society's seventeenth season was given in the Theatre Royal to a crowded audience. The programme was one of the finest yet given by the Society, and included a selection from Wagner's Opera Lohengrin (expressly arranged by the Conductor, Mr. Angelo Forrest). This composition was admirably rendered, Mrs. Greenwood being a charming Elsa. Another feature was Mr. Forrest's execution of Weber's "Concertstück," accompanied by the orchestra, and given, we believe, for the first time in New Zealand. The pathetic "Coronach," from Macfarren's Lady of the Lake, was sung almost to perfection by the chorus. Miss Randall and Mr. Lang were very successful in their songs. The band and chorus acquitted themselves to admiration, and the large increase in their number was very noticeable. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen formed the second part of the programme, and was capitally performed, the solo parts being efficiently taken by Mrs. Greenwood, Miss Randall, Mr. Page, and Mr. Widdop.

Wellington, Somerset.—One of the most successful Concerts ever held at the Town Hall was given on Friday, the 16th ult., by the Harmonic Society, assisted by members of the Tiverton branch of the Western Counties Musical Association. The piece chosen for performance was Mendelssohn's Elijah, which had been rehearsed with great care by the painstaking Conductor, Mr. Manley. The soloists were Mrs. Bate, Mrs. Melhuish, Mr. Francis, and Mr. Melhuish, all of whom were highly effective. The pianoforte accompaniments were carefully played by Miss Warren, the honorary pianist to the Society; and Mr. Moore, of Exeter, presided at the harmonium.

Welshpool.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their first Concert of the present season, under the patronage of the Lord Lieutenant of the County (the Earl of Powis), Lord Sudeley, the Hon. F. S. A. Hanbury Tracy, M.P., C. W. Williams Wynne, Esq., M.P., and the élite of the neighbourhood, in the Town Hall on Wednesday the 21st ult., in aid of the funds of the Montgomeryshire Infirmary and Welshpool Dispensary. Sir Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, The May Queen, was performed, followed by a miscellaneous selection. The principal characters in The May Queen were sustained by Miss Dora Hope, Miss M. C. Powell, Mr. H. Probert, and Mr. George Lockley, all of whom rendered their parts very effectively. The choruses were remarkably well given, with a precision and attention to light and shade which must have occasioned a vast amount of labour both to Conductor and chorus. Miss Helen C. Porteous was the accompanist, and also gave an artistic rendering of Mendelssohn's "Rondo capriccioso." Mr. J. W. Godsell conducted in a highly efficient manner.

York.—The third and last Concert of the York Musical Society was given on the 21st ult. in the Festival Concert Rooms. Mrs. Osgood, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Shakespeare, and Signor Zoboli were the vocalists, and their rendering of the various items in the programme was enthusiastically applauded, and several encores were demanded. M. Musin's violin solos, and Mr. F. H. Cowen's pianoforte-playing were much appreciated, and the chorus rendered efficient aid in several part-songs. Mr. Shaw conducted in the absence of Mr. Burton, from illness.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Samuel William Short to St. Andrew's, Bethnal Green.—Mr. William Robert Poulter to St. John Baptist, Leytonstone.—Mr. Thomas Armstrong, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. John's Church, Lytham.—Mr. J. Hart Gordon, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's, Spring Grove, Isleworth.—Mr. Arthur J. Greenish to St. Mary's Parish Church, Battersea, S.W.—Mr. J. H. Jones, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Church, St. Thomas, Ontario.—Mr. R. Sebastian Hart to St. Andrew's, Surbiton.—Mr. Thomas Croft, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Andrew's, Rodney Street, Liverpool.—Mr. Jno. Grover, to Weigh House Chapel, London.—Mr. Albert E. Fisher, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George's Church, Montreal.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. W. H. Cooke, Precentor and Choirmaster to St. George's, Perry Hill, S.E.—Mr. E. Rumney Smith, Choirmaster to St. John the Baptist Church, Holland Road, Kensington, W.—Mr. George Minett, Bass, to All Saints', Margaret Street.—Mr. F. J. Sharland, to the Church of Holy Trinity, Hoxton, N.

Organists will be glad to know that this collection of Organ Pieces abounds equally in movements for the softer stops, suitable for use in church, as well as others of a more brilliant type—none of which offer special difficulties to the player.

The task undertaken by Mr. Best, in the re-issue of this music for English organs, has been an occasional but well-considered amplification of the text between Treble and Bass, combined with a freer use of the Pedale, which enters throughout as a component part of the design.

ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS

OF

ROBERT SCHUMANN

CLARA SCHUMANN.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have much pleasure in calling attention to the new and complete edition of Schumann's Works, edited by Madame Schumann, and about to be published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. This is of course the first time it has been possible to obtain a complete edition of Schumann's Works, and it is perhaps unnecessary to point out the great advantage the edition will receive in being edited by Madame Schumann.

The first issue of the publication, containing—
Op. 9. Carnival
Op. 10. Phantasiestücke
Op. 17. Phantasie
Op. 21. Novelletten
} In One Volume, 10s. 6d. net,

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

NEW WORK FOR SINGING CLASSES.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	"ZAMPA."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe)	"MARTA."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v' ha)	"LA SONNAMBULA."
4.	From Yonder Vale and Hill (D' immenso giubilo)	"LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
5.	Here we rest (Qui la selva)	"LA SONNAMBULA."
6.	Onward to Battle (Squilli echeggi)	"IL TROVATORE."
7.	Rataplan (Rataplan)	"LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
8.	The Gipsy's Star (Vedi! le fosche)	"IL TROVATORE."
9.	War Song of the Druids (Dell' aura tua profetica)	"NORMA."
10.	In Mercy, hear us! (Cielo clemente)	"LA FIGLIA DEL REGGIMENTO."
11.	Come to the Fair! (Accorete, giovinette)	"MARTA."
12.	Friendship (Per te d' immenso giubilo)	"LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR."
13.	Away, the Morning freshly breaking (The Chorus of Fishermen)	"MASANIELLO."
14.	Pretty Village Maiden (Peasants' Serenade Chorus)	"FAUST."
15.	The soft Winds around us (The Gipsy Chorus)	"PRECIOSA."
16.	See how lightly on the Blue Sea (Senti la danza invitaci)	"LUCREZIA BORGIA."
17.	See the Moonlight Beam (Non fav Motto)	" "

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

PATENTED 1862, 1868, 1871, 1875 & 1879, THROUGHOUT EUROPE & AMERICA.

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE."

"A. FETIS,
"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.
"D. MAGNUS."

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

"These Pianos have received the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

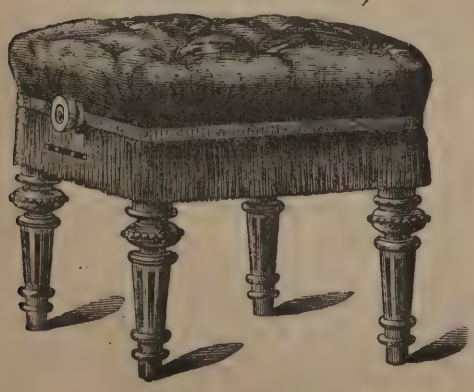
PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")



THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

J. THEOBALD & COMPANY'S SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S HARP

THE latest and greatest addition to the music-loving public. We have been so long before the public (over six years) as the producers of articles suited to the popular taste, and have always met with such great success and given such universal satisfaction, that it is needless for us to say that this Harp is of the very best manufacture, and certain to give the utmost gratification to those who purchase one. Please not to confound it with the trashy articles advertised under various names, which are utterly useless. We are too widely known all over the world to risk our reputation by offering any article not worth the money.

This Harp has been made a portable size, so that it can be easily carried about, and each one is packed in a neat case. We warrant it correct in all its notes, pure in tone, easy to learn, and exceedingly cheap. It can be played very softly, or with sufficient force to fill a large room with sound. It is so simple and easy to learn that we guarantee any person can play perfectly after a few minutes' practice. It is equally suited for solos or chords as an accompaniment to any instrument, and with the voice is unequalled. The sound of a distant peal of bells can be so closely imitated as to deceive the most practised ear. The Harp is so marked that it can be played from the old notation or tonic sol-fa.

It can be played by holding it on the left arm and playing with the right hand, or can be laid on the table and played with both. So great is the demand for these Harps that we have determined to give gratis twenty-four pieces of sacred and secular music with each.

We are making them in two sizes, and following our usual manner of doing business we offer them for a few weeks only at a ridiculously low price, in order to make them thoroughly known; after which we shall cease to offer them at these terms. The largest size has nineteen strings, and will be sent, securely packed, for 12s. 6d. The smaller size, with fifteen strings, for 8s. 6d. Orders must be accompanied by P.O.O., and the Coupon, as below.

"MUSICAL TIMES'" COUPON.

Entitles the Holder to One Prince of Wales's Harp, on receipt of P.O.O., if sent before March 31.

Organists will be glad to know that this collection of Organ Pieces abounds equally in movements for the softer stops, suitable for use in church, as well as others of a more brilliant type—none of which offer special difficulties to the player.

The task undertaken by Mr. Best, in the reissue of this music for English organs, has been an occasional but well-considered amplification of the text between Treble and Bass, combined with a freer use of the Pedale, which enters throughout as a component part of the design.

THE OPERA.

By JOSEPH GREEN.

WE assume it to be true that the authors of the "Pirates of Penzance" are dividing between them, in the United States, hundreds of pounds weekly. In the interests of art, and of English art, can we felicitate our musicians on the fact? Many of the more serious amongst them would answer firmly in the negative. Fully appreciating their point of view, we are inclined to take an opposite opinion; founded not on the nature or value of the particular fact, but on its causes and tendencies. It must be remembered—and the qualification is not usually much respected by the English professor—that the question to be considered is dramatic music; covering a wide ground from the vaudeville to the Wagnerian tetralogy; and involving elements altogether foreign to ordinary professorial notions of music, or the art of music. The time may not be distant when the drama, the opera, and music will be recognised as three distinct, if closely interwoven, arts, each having its specific department in a national conservatorium. The blending of the three produces the ludicrous results we see daily, of actors endeavouring to sing, singers endeavouring to act, and worse than all, the virtuoso abandoning his digital exercises or concerto to write an opera.

On reading the recent reports from America, it would be an easy thing for the serious musician to pose in a pensive attitude, and, with his forefinger in a volume of Bach, moralise on the earthly-mindedness of particular audiences in New York and in London. It would nevertheless be more practical, if not more wise, to consider that if such audiences are too busy to comprehend musical developments, and are only concerned with broad results or general effects, they come fresh from the world, the passions and emotions of which it is the business of the musician to study, and in dramatic writing to delineate; and moreover, there are in those audiences of eager, pushing, "coarse-fibred men of business," long-headed lawyers and merchants, whose dicta, even on questions with which they are little familiar, are not to be disparaged; and who are too independent to sacrifice their own judgments to the formulas, the traditions, the idolatries and the jargon of schools, philosophers, and professionals. We have a very high authority for asserting that in the invention and conduct of a drama the practical spirit must prevail. "The dramatic poet," says Schlegel, "is not allowed to dream away under his inspiration. He must take the straightest road to his end."

When we recollect that, in the opera of our day, it is not so much a question of subordinating the music to the dramatic element as of rightly amalgamating both, we think the quotation we have given is worthy of the attention of even the serious-minded musician, who may jealously look askance at Mr. Sullivan's success. We do not for one instant acknowledge that the productions of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan represent the exact amalgam desired, even within the limits of their own very modest aims. We are quite aware that Gregorian tones with the ends off are not melodies; and that a vox regis, with a grand wind-up of accords plaqués on the piano, is only an amiable device for deluding the singer into the self-glorification of the historical organ-blower. But there is a cleverness in Mr. Sullivan's adaptation of means to an end which amounts to a stroke of genius, and it is not impossible that he has laid the foundation of a new school or type of English comic opera. He has well calculated that the success of his musical trifles would be mostly due to the satire and wit of his literary collaborator. Secure in his well-known reputation as a consummate musician, he has not despised the lowliness, and, indeed, the well-recognised charms and special merits of a faithfully rendered second violin part. Conscious of his powers, he has known when and where to assert his own individuality or the claims of his art, in the masterly treatment of a vulgar musical reminiscence, or in the harmonic colouring of a bar or two of absurd recitation. If the ultra-classical musician is confident that to attain success in similar productions is merely a question of condescension, he has only to unbend and try his own hand. If the straight-laced critic is inclined to attribute the whole of the credit, such as it is, to the author of the libretto, let him ask himself the question, How much of the somewhat obtrusive popularity of the word "never" in "H.M.S. Pinafore" is due to the comicality of the situation and dramatic context, and how much to the happy choice of chords by which the exclamation is accompanied? Mr. Sullivan has taken "the straightest road to his end," and without troubling ourselves with the value of the end proposed, his success must be admitted to be one of the many lessons to the musician which come from outside, from the busy world, from the seething crowd in which the great models and great idols of academies are tossed about, or melted down into serviceable vessels of every-day use.

It cannot be disputed that, of all subjects connected with the musical art, the opera demands the widest sympathies and the most general knowledge for its intelligent appreciation. On that account it is the least understood by the average professional, who shuts himself up in a small routine of tuitional duties and solitary study of the effects and musical literature of perhaps one instrument. The principal ingredient of the opera is the dramatic element. Otherwise it would be folly in the composer to lower his ambition to the level of the capabilities of a stage-chorus, or cramp his technical resources within the limits of a dramatic situation. Obvious as is this truth it is often contested; because with the very professional musician wherever music is it must be supreme, and with his brethren the critics he will, in and out of season, babble of technicalities that are frequently incompatible with the exigencies of the lyric stage. Some of these technicalities might have been more possible in the ancient Greek drama; and in fact in the earlier modern operas, the subjects of which were professedly imitations of classical models, there were certain devices which were only too rigidly attended to according to the musical canons then in vogue. In the loose terminology we are all of us apt to employ in treating these subjects, we speak of "form" in music as something compared and identified with "design"; whereas in point of fact it is only framework. The difference is very apparent. The same framework may serve for many designs. In art "design" is distinctly an element of beauty, but "form" in music is only an element of stability. It gives clearness and coherence. Beauty may exist independently of one or the other. It is not now a question whether clearness of expression makes us more sensible of the beauty of ideas suggested in a work of art. It is sufficient that such beauty exists. It must be admitted that vagueness nearly akin to incoherence is certainly an element of beauty and sublimity. The most striking illustrations of the truth, in music, are the indescribable effects that in some minds are produced by the more ancient forms of liturgical music, and in the civilised world generally by the use of the common minor mode. In the first case we have absolutely no form, and little or none of the coherence which in short unrhythmical strains can only be attained by strict relation to key. In the second instance we have a divided tonic relation, and yet musical form is wholly a question of the two elements, rhythm and key-relationship. They are self-existent materials; that is to say, natural facts independent of the composer, and one of them, "rhythm," is not only independent of music but even of sound. So much is that the case that in dramatic music, and in a great measure in common lyrics, it is the dramatist and the poet who impose the form on the musician, or so much of it as depends upon rhythm; and in regard to the choice of consecution of keys, there may be certain natural checks on the composer as there are in harmony, but no absolute compulsion. The freedom of choice has been pretty well used and abused in instrumental compositions. And with slight modifications there are sufficient varieties of form in use to serve all purposes, as long as the present phases of the art exist; that is to say, as long as absolute music continues to please. As for dramatic music, when we hear it said approvingly that an opera such as the "Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, is "symphonic" in form, we are inclined to suspect that the critic, or the composer, or both, have misconceived the nature of a dramatic work. The adjective "symphonic" means usually, in music, "elaborated," and according to existing canons which require a considerable space or portion of time to develop. If it is intended merely to mean "continuity" it is a misnomer; because the continuity of dramatic music resides in the individuality of the composer, and is as apparent in one form or in one figuration as another. If it means simply "connection," or the absence of those awkward pauses in the old Italian operas between the arias or concerted pieces, the use of the term in these days is an anachronism. It was well enough in the time of Spohr, who, we think, first used the term in the sense we speak of, and in reference to form in opera. But a generation that has grown up with even Verdi must have long since passed that epoch. If the term "symphonic" means what Goetz seems to have imagined, it is decidedly an artistic fault. When that composer was in his teens, the fame of the then departed Mendelssohn was in its zenith. In the music of Goetz we see, amongst others, the influence of Mendelssohn, not only in the carefully massed and satisfying instrumentation with a few sporadic novelties of effect, but in the persistent use of particular types of figuration as well as in the iteration of phrases. With little of the energy, and still less of the individuality, of the prototype, the imitation of similar mechanical devices, as well as the still later device of straining after polyphonic detail, more for its own sake than for the formal development of the composition, gives to the operas of Goetz the semblance of chamber music, and is essentially anti-dramatic. The kind of stitched continuity he attains ends in monotony, and the many obvious beauties of his music, more idyllic than dramatic, are lost for want of relief. In the treatment of a subject like that of the quarrels of Katharine and Petruchio, which in Shakespeare may be comedy but on the opera stage is little better than farce, the incessant lament and whining of the orchestra and the virtuoso-like phraseology of Goetz appear, and are incongruous. On the other hand, the arabesque of charmingly worked and truly melodious passages pleases the musician, and soothes the general hearer into acquiescence in what he has read of the irreparable loss to the lyric stage in the too early demise of Hermann Goetz. But melodious passages wreathed together are not melody, and good even writing is not drama, admitting that with Goetz the setting of the text is so conscientious and within the limits of his power as a dramatist so satisfying, that to follow his music, book in hand, is of itself a delight, when we choose to abandon ourselves to what is set before us, and anticipate neither more nor less than we can expect from his capabilities.

If the "Taming of the Shrew" is to be held up as the latest and fairest example of German comedy-opera, we are rather disposed to take courage and back the hopes of our own country and the future progeny of "H.M.S. Pinafore." Whether the Germans are practical or no, it is scarcely consistent for the musician at least to follow the German critics themselves of forty or fifty years ago, and denounce the Germans as undramatic. But it must be confessed the German musical mind vibrates at this moment between the shallows of virtuosity and the profundities of the weird and the vague. There seems to be no medium suited to comedy. It is all very well to ridicule the tendency of the German mind to dive, leaving the spectators waiting for a climax, whilst the author disappears in search of a cause. As for some recent authors of German music, we often wish they would disappear in search of anything they choose. A brilliant flash of silence would be a grateful rest to the audience.

It is well to bear in mind that in 1880 we are nearly a century removed from the models still held up to us in the schools for imitation, and that the three greatest dramatic composers of our time, Wagner, Verdi, and Gounod, have reached or are on the verge of old age. The youngest light, Goetz, is already extinguished, and as far as our vision extends at this moment, the horizon seems bare. What is the cause? We believe that casually we have already suggested the cause. The art itself has in our day become immensely complicated, and is also attaching itself to studies, even scientific studies, which are of immense benefit when due attention is paid to the division of labour; but it is impossible that the young musician can overtake them, particularly when in his own art, according to the examples of recent composers, technical artifices are presented to him for imitation by his teachers as the sine quâ non. We venture to recommend the young English dramatic composer to return to simplicity. We commenced with a quotation from Schlegel, and we may as well finish it. He says: "To the dramatist, if we wish to act with skill and determination, we must make up our minds that we have somehow or other become masters of our subject, and not be perpetually recurring to an examination of the theory on which it rests." In language less elegant, and indeed in the language of the music-halls, for which we can find a corner in our philosophy, we would add: "If you have a decided leaning for the stage, if you feel there is melody in you, 'shove it out!'"

In Mr. Carl Rosa's bills at Her Majesty's Theatre, the "Bohemian Girl" still alternates with more classical productions. It outlives, and will continue to outlive, the sneers of critics more professional than artistic, and more self-conscious of the ability of writing a creditable symphony than a bearable tune. When last we scanned the countenances of an audience rapt in the charms of "When other lips," we were quite satisfied they were not middle-aged, and that the attraction of the music was not the mere vulgar one of reminiscence. On the contrary, they seemed full of the sap of this new and gallant cinquecento generation, noisy with the shouts of Whitechapel Pizarros, and the almost too free intonation of volunteer bands. The quiet generation of Balfe and Ainsworth, of Carlyle and Tennyson, of Harriet Martineau and Mrs. Trollope, is gone by. The recent past, with its many pieties and some virtues, has been suddenly closed by the fiats of licensed victuallers in the metropolis and shopocracies in the north; but the touch of nature remains. Our artistic hopes rest on that naturalism, the keynote of which as a system of philosophy was, we think, first struck by Schopenhauer; and there is a sympathetic vibration of the sound in an English poet and in a French novelist of the day. Its spirit may appear in many forms, some of them more or less repulsive. It may be incarnate in Jew, Jingo, or Gentile, but wherever it is, it is the essence of art. The refinements of art, without the essence, constitute the latest schools of concert and chamber-music. It is utterly unsuited to the drama, and has no future, no progenerative power. We should be pleased to see the tastes of the new generation of English musicians gravitating towards the stage; for to say the truth their present essays are redolent only of what may be well called the domestic virtuosities.

CLAUDIO MONTEVERDE.

His Life, Work, and Influence.

By W. S. Rockstro.

Of the few great Composers whose work has left an indelible impression upon the history of Art, very few indeed have influenced its progress more powerfully than the almost forgotten subject of the present memoir—a Master whose very name is scarcely known, at the present day, to one musician out of a hundred, while we may safely say that not one out of a thousand would be prepared, on the spur of the moment, to give a clear account of what he did, or to say how, or when, or where, or why he did it. A critic bold enough to speak of Monteverde nowadays, even in "Art circles," would certainly be called upon to explain who the great maestro was; yet, two centuries and a half ago, that maestro's influence was strong enough to overthrow a system which had been universally accepted for ages, and to substitute for it a new one, which has ever since remained in uninterrupted use, without passing through a second revolution worthy to be compared in importance with that which brought it into existence. Monteverde's claim to be regarded as the inventor of modern music is impregnable, and has never been questioned save by a few superficial critics, who have failed to comprehend the breadth of the gulf which separates the mediæval Schools from those of later date. But, since Pierre Joseph Zimmermann and Alexandre Oulibichef have written unadvisedly on this subject, it behoves us to be more than usually careful in dealing with the history of an epoch of infinite significance, and very cautious indeed in drawing our own deductions from the facts presented to us.

Claudio Monteverde was born at Cremona in the year 1568. This, at least, is the date given by Arisi;* and, though it has not been suffered to pass unchallenged, there is no reason to doubt its accuracy. At a very early age he entered the service of the Duke of Mantua, in the capacity of a Violist; and no doubt the experience he gained while playing constantly in a well-trained Orchestra was of infinite use to him afterwards, in the elaboration of a system of instrumentation which not only surpassed all that had ever been imagined by any earlier composer, but even anticipated much that we of the present day are a little too ready to claim as our own exclusive property. Even at this early period his talent was too striking to remain long in obscurity. His playing excited so much admiration, that, though his parentage was obscure, and his position a humble one, he was treated with marked favour by the ducal Court, towards which he ever afterwards manifested the warmest possible devotion. While still practising his favourite instrument he studied counterpoint, under Marc Antonio Ingegneri, the Duke's maestro di cappella; but, in spite of all that P. Martini and others have said in praise of his Polyphonic Music, it is impossible to believe that he ever really worked hard at the time-honoured laws upon which the praxis of the best Masters of his time was based. To be a good contrapuntist, one must love counterpoint—and it is certain that Monteverde did not love it. Its bonds were irksome to him: and he broke them as constantly and as capriciously as Rossini did two centuries later. No doubt he knew that he was breaking them. So, no doubt, did Rossini. But, what respect can either composer have felt for rules the infraction of which he would not take the trouble to correct? There is, indeed, a strange analogy between the art-lives of these two great men. Like Rossini, Monteverde cast artistic tradition to the winds, wrote entirely for effect, and, when effect was uncalled for, with an amount of carelessness which would have been blamed in the merest tyro. Like Rossini, too, he enjoyed an almost incredibly brilliant reputation, which he owed entirely to the freshness of his transcendent genius, and in nowise to the extent of his learning. Genius is so frequently precocious that we are not at all surprised to find him publishing his first book of "Canzonette a tre voci" when he was no more than sixteen years of age. It is the date on the title-page of this work—printed at Venice, by J. Vincenti and R. Amadino, in 1584,*—which has given rise to the doubt thrown upon Arisi's statement that he was born in 1568. But, surely it is less wonderful that he should have written these little pieces at sixteen, than that he should have composed an Opera at seventy-four; and, if we suppose him to have been born before the year in question, he must have been even more than seventy-four when he produced his last dramatic work. The truth is, where real genius exists at all, conditions of youth or senility fail to affect it in any way whatever. Nevertheless, Monteverde's youthful productions cannot be reckoned among his happiest efforts. Not only the Canzonets, but the earlier books of Madrigals also, abound in irregular progressions, which can only be attributed, either to reckless negligence, or very imperfect contrapuntal training—crudities which no one in the habit of hearing good music could possibly have written because he liked them. Even in his later works such passages are by no means uncommon: for instance, the grinding collisions exhibited in two of the following passages from "Orfeo" could scarcely be exceeded for harshness by any of the most advanced productions of our latest school of dramatic music; while the succession of fifths in the third example would be regarded as a stupid practical joke, were it presented in the form of an exercise in Thorough-bass.

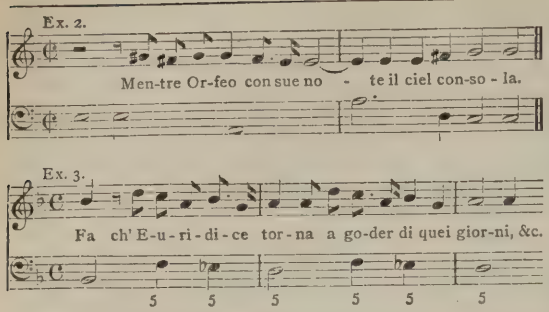
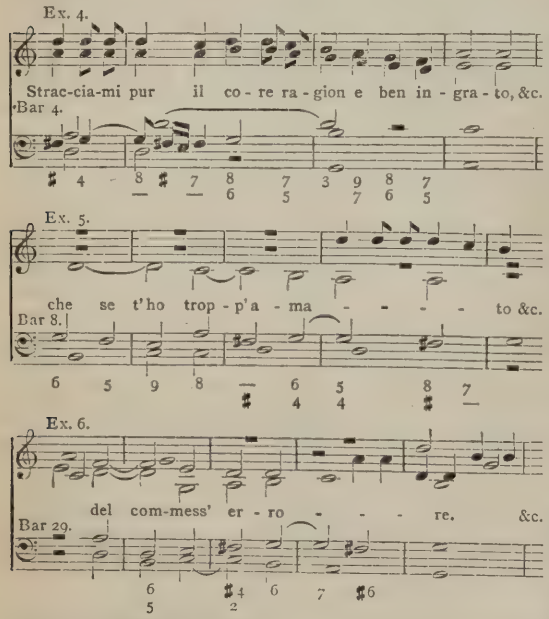
* Cremona Litterata, tome iii.

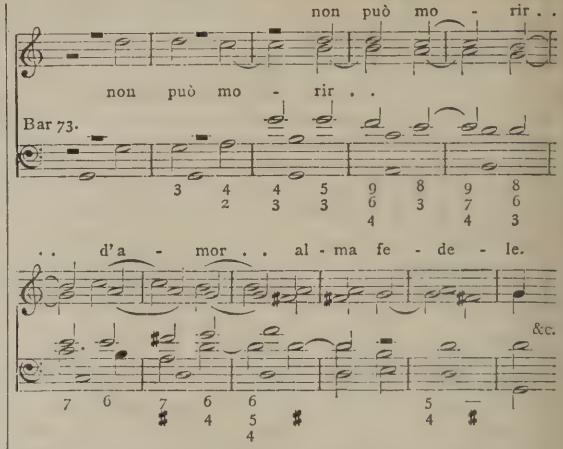
* Caffi ("Storia del Musica Sacra," Venezia, 1854, tome i., p. 216) gives 1582 as the date of Monteverde's first publication. But this is probably a misprint. No work is known of earlier date than the "Canzonette" above mentioned.



These careless passages are extremely interesting, as symptoms of the natural tendency of Monteverde's genius. He took no pains to correct faults, which, from his point of view, were of very slight importance. But, side by side with these ugly blemishes, we find passages which must be carefully distinguished from them, and placed in quite another category—tentative progressions in which the endeavour to reach some new ideal, as yet but half comprehended, is too evident to escape the notice of the most superficial observer. The "Third Book of Madrigals," published in 1594, is replete with these suggestions. In "Stracciami pur il core" we see signs of an ever-increasing affection for the chord of the Dominant Seventh, and its inversions, which, though not as yet used without the necessary preparation, are so employed as to give a curiously modern effect to the cadences in which they constantly occur. Example 4 makes, indeed, a very near approach—the nearest that can be found at that period—to the ordinary modern use; though the Sevenths are really quite defensible, on the older system, as Passing-notes.

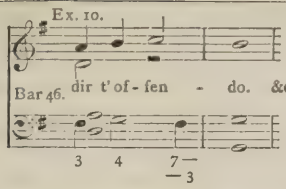


At the seventy-third bar of this very beautiful madrigal begins a passage which has been frequently quoted as the earliest known instance of the use of certain forms of the Ninth and Seventh, now considered perfectly legitimate; but here, again, the discords, harsh though they are, are all carefully prepared, suspended, and resolved, in strict accordance with the recognised practice of the sixteenth century, the only law broken being that which forbids the resolution of a Suspension to be sounded, in one part, while the discord itself is heard in another.



Such passages as these can only be regarded as earnest endeavours to discover some rich untried effect. No attempt is made at first to reach this effect by forbidden paths. For some considerable time the means used are perfectly orthodox. It is not until we arrive at the "Fifth Book of Madrigals," first published in 1599, that we find the old laws entirely disregarded. Here, indeed, begins a new state of things. One Madrigal alone—"Cruda Amarilli"—exhibits nearly all the most important points of difference between the ancient and the modern styles. To say nothing of the sharp at the signature, or the use of the Diminished Fifth and Diminished Seventh, we find, in the tenth bar, a Ninth and a Seventh taken without any preparation whatever: in bar eighteen the Bass interrupts an exceedingly harsh collision between the Alto and Tenor, by entering, after a semibreve rest, with a diminished triad: in bar thirty-three and the two following measures, Major Sevenths are approached in one part after another by the leap of a Fourth; while, in bar forty-six, the Dominant Seventh asserts itself, in a perfect cadence, much as we sometimes hear it asserted by a half-fledged Tenor in a Cathedral Choir, who dwells upon it coaxingly in some tempting "Amen," uncertain whether he will be called to account for the indulgence or not, but quite determined to swell out the luscious dissonance to the latest possible moment in any case.

Ex. 10.



Oulibichef and Zimmermann maintain that these passages were not new—that Sevenths had been heard before. Undoubtedly Sevenths had been heard before, but only as Suspension or Passing-notes, like those in "Stracciami pur il core." It was the unprepared Seventh that was new: and, that this had not been heard before was sufficiently proved by the hostility with which it was received by the Polyphonists. In the year 1600, Giovanni Maria Artusi, a disciple of Zarlino and a contrapuntist of no mean reputation, published at Bologna a dissertation, entitled "Delle imperfettioni della moderna musica," in which he passed some very severe strictures upon "Cruda Amarilli," and denounced the unprepared dissonances quoted in our examples as innovations till then unknown. His objections were supported by other writers of acknowledged eminence, and much bitter invective was expended in the resulting controversy. We cannot deny that the objectors had reason on their side. They could not see, as we can now, that the unwonted progressions of which they complained were opening the way to new forms of art capable of being moulded into types of the most exquisite beauty. They only saw that their enemy was destroying the Madrigal—a lovely creation, already brought, by Palestrina, and Luca Marenzio, to a state of absolute perfection, in a peculiar style founded upon principles too firm to admit the possibility of modification. And this threatened destruction naturally aroused their anger. Even Monteverde himself did not clearly understand what he was doing. He fully believed in the existence of the unknown beauties after which he was groping in the dark; but he had not yet discovered their true habitat. Meanwhile, he was thoroughly in earnest; and, deeply grieved at the animosity he had provoked, he answered his detractors in a letter, entitled "Agli studiosi lettori," which he prefixed to the later editions of his Madrigals, and which was reprinted in 1607 by his brother, Giulio Cesare, as a preface to the "Scherzi a tre voci." The arguments contained in this defence were not, however, considered satisfactory. The war continued to rage with unabated fury. In the hope of strengthening his position the persecuted composer visited Rome, where he dedicated a volume of Church music to Pope Clement VIII. His opponents can scarcely have regarded his treatment of the Polyphonic Mass in any other light than that of a concession; for, in his best pieces of Ecclesiastical Music, he was careful, at any rate at this period of his career, to exclude altogether the dissonances which he employed so freely in his secular works. Still, it is not in Church Music that his genius shines most brightly. This is only too clearly perceptible, even in the exceptionally favourable example preserved in the "Saggio di Contrappunto" of P. Martini—an "Agnus Dei" for six Voices, which the learned editor minutely analyses, with a full perception of the cleverness of its construction, but without noticing the painful want of spontaneity which mars its effect throughout. The imitations it exhibits are, indeed, sufficiently ingenious, but betray everywhere too plainly the labour that has been bestowed upon them. Moreover, their effect is greatly weakened in more than one place by responses made in the third above instead of the customary fifth or octave—clear signs that six-part counterpoint was not the department of Art in which the composer found himself most thoroughly at ease.

On the death of Ingegneri, in the year 1603, Monteverde was promoted to the important post of maestro di cappella at the ducal Court. His duties were now exceedingly onerous, and his time was fully occupied from morning till night. When not actually engaged in composition, or in directing the Music performed at Court, he was to be found in constant attendance upon the Duke, who held him in the highest possible estimation, and to whose artistic pleasures he was always ready to minister. The advantages attendant upon this high position led, in process of time, to the turning-point in his eventful career. In the year 1607, the Duke, Vincenzo Gonzaga, celebrated, with extraordinary pomp, the marriage of his son Francesco with Margherita, Infanta of Savoy; and, in emulation of the effect produced on a similar occasion at Florence seven years previously, by the production of Peri's "Euridice," he commissioned Monteverde to compose an Opera to grace the festival, and invited the poet Rinuccini to Mantua, in order that he might provide the necessary libretto. Rinuccini furnished the material for two grand Operas, of which one, entitled "Dafne," was committed to Marco di Zanobi da Gagliano, while the other, "Arianna," was set to music by the great maestro di cappella. The success of this last-named production was unprecedented. Gagliano, whose "Dafne" was far from a bad Opera, showed the true spirit of an artist, and was one of the first to sing the praises of his rival's work. The scene in which the deserted Ariadne bemoans her sad fate drew tears from all who heard it, and produced an equally profound impression when it was revived thirty-three years later in Venice. Unhappily this beautiful Aria, "Lasciatemi morire," is the only part of the Opera which now remains to us, with the exception of a few notes of recitative quoted by Doni. We have given it entire, accompanied only by the original figured bass, the crudity of which may be, and probably was intended to be, greatly modified by a careful disposition of the chords indicated:—

Ex. 11.

Lasci-a - - te-mi mo - ri - re, las - ci-a - te -
- mi mo - ri - re, e che vo - le - te voi . . che mi con-for-te in co-sì du-ra sor-te, in co-sì gran mar - tire? las -
- cia - te-me mo-ri - re, las - cia-te - mi mo - ri - re!

Monteverde's triumph was now complete. He had, at last, found his true vocation. All the experience he had so carefully accumulated had been brought to bear upon the new work; and this had proved him to be incontestably the greatest master of dramatic music then living. All opposition to the hated dissonances was silenced for ever, for they were here heard in their true place. They were made to sing the language of passion, a language which they alone could express, and which was as much needed in the Lyric Drama as it was out of place in Polyphonic Church Music, where the language of devotion forms the only appropriate element. The Madrigal had been brought to its highest state of perfection by ecclesiastical composers, and had, therefore, assimilated itself, in a certain sense, to the ecclesiastical style: hence it was, that, in interfering with the one, Monteverde had unintentionally interfered with the other, thereby raising a storm which he found it difficult to subdue. But, henceforward, his path was strewn with flowers. His greatest successes were obtained upon the stage; and, till the day of his death, he was able to hold his own against all competitors in his own peculiar style.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 64).

Before quoting from the letters in which Mendelssohn discussed the project that removed him, for a while, from Leipzig to Berlin, it may be advisable to state, in few words, how their subject arose. The then King of Prussia had formed a grand idea for the development of the Academy of Arts in his capital, and proposed to reconstruct it on a very comprehensive scale. It was intended to constitute four sections, respectively devoted to painting, sculpture, architecture, and music, each presided over by a director, who, in turn with the others and for a fixed period, should have the superintendence of the entire institution. In the face of such an arrangement it, of course, became necessary to appoint as director the most eminent man in each of the four professions, and Mendelssohn, to whom the distinction fairly belonged as regards music, was thought of before all others. Wirklicher Geheimrath Herr von Masson began operations, with a view to securing the master, in a fashion not without a certain cunning. It was well-known that Mendelssohn loved Leipzig, and that he had a strong feeling against Berlin, not so much as a place of residence (his family lived there) as a field for the exercise of his art. It therefore became an object to secure the co-operation of the Mendelssohn family in any attempt to induce him to remove from Leipzig to the Prussian metropolis. This Herr von Masson so far managed to do, that the composer's brother Paul opened negotiations vivâ voce, and subsequently continued in writing. The reply of Felix to one of Paul's communications opens the story of the transaction, as far as the published letters reveal it. With his usual keen perception, the master saw how much a desire to have him near them influenced his Berlin relatives, and he referred to it at the outset in terms that fully indicate the sweetness and tenderness of his disposition: "Just as I was about to write to you yesterday, to thank you cordially again and again for the fresh proof of your true brotherly love which you have given me, your letter arrived, and I can only repeat the same thing. Even if the affair leads to nothing further than to show me (what is the fact) that you participate in my wish once more to pass a portion of our lives together—that you, too, feel there is something wanting when we are not all united in one spot—this is to me invaluable, and more gratifying than I can express. Whether it be attended with a happy result or not, I would not give up such a conviction for anything in the world." But while feeling all this deeply, Mendelssohn at once started grave objections to the proposed scheme as far as the conditions laid down concerned himself. He did not see his way to be, at one and the same time, director of public concerts and head of the Music School: "Either of these situations would suit me, but not the two combined." His reasons are clearly stated: "Were I to undertake to give yearly concerts in Berlin (and the acceptance of these proposals would make it my duty so to do) then I must stand in a different relation to the orchestra from what I could possibly do as the mere director of the music-class. I must be quite as much their real chief there as I am here, and as every regular director must be, which would only be possible by the establishment of a Musical Academy as a Royal Institution, and by its connection with the orchestra in Berlin." We clearly see that the master coveted a grand and well-recognised position which should give him large scope for, and absolute power in, the exercise of his art. He even makes a bid to this end in the same letter: "It occurred to me that the offer might be renewed of a public sphere of activity, with which I should be quite satisfied. It must, however, be within special limits, despotic as regards the musicians, and consequently imposing in outward position (not merely brilliant in a pecuniary point of view); otherwise, according to my ideas, it would be a failure after the very first trial." Subsequently Mendelssohn and von Masson met to talk the matter over, the purport of their conversation being given in another letter to Paul. Here we find the master again insisting upon the dignity and prerogatives of such a post as that he was invited to fill. Moreover, with the business instinct of his race, he demanded a definite understanding as to the work required of him: "I brought under his notice the difficulties opposed to a bonâ-fide direction of the present class; and as he had mentioned that these would not occupy much of my time, but that it was expected I should under the new system undertake additional work, I begged at least to be told what were the limits of this system, and the duties I had to perform; that I was quite willing to work, but did not choose to pledge myself to the performance of functions not precisely defined. With regard to the concerts, I told him . . . that I would have nothing to do with the orchestra, except on this condition—that I was to be absolute director-in-chief, &c." Mendelssohn then half apologises to his brother for such insistance: "I hope you agree with me on this point, for though money and ready complaisance are indeed of no small value, still they are insufficient without that entire tranquillity and security about the future which can now be given if they are in earnest in the matter. I can assure you that there was no undue particularity in my words, but I am certain you will not blame me for going on sure grounds, before giving up such a position as my present one." Following this comes an admirable proof of the master's straightforwardness: "I purpose, in the course of a few days, to make known to our Concert-Director and Government-President that I have received such an offer and that it is probable I may accept it. Perhaps you may not approve of this, but I feel I cannot act otherwise. If my negotiations with Masson were to terminate by our agreeing, without my having given any hint of such a transaction, it would show a want of good feeling on my part, and, indeed, in my present circumstances, a lack of common gratitude."

A few days later, Mendelssohn wrote to his brother again, showing himself nervously anxious lest Paul should be annoyed by his hesitancy in accepting the Berlin offer: "Do not allow any difference of opinion between Masson and me to impair that delightful and perfect harmony between us which always rejoices me and makes me so happy. . . . Do not permit anything whatever to be changed between you and me. Promise me this. You know how much I have at heart our being able to live together at some future day; but if we were only to pass a few untroubled years thus, and I were then to go on my way in vexation, that would be worse than it is now, and I would gladly avoid it. . . . As I said, dear Paul, promise me never, under any circumstances, to be displeased with me." How charmingly the nature of the man appears in these sentences! No wonder Mendelssohn was loved as few were loved before him or have been after him!

Referring to the Berlin matter in the letter just quoted from, the master shows himself more dissatisfied than ever, owing to an impression that von Masson wished to impose conditions other than those Paul Mendelssohn had been empowered to offer: "I will gladly devote my time and efforts to the mere possibility of our once more living together, but I must confess that, since Masson's last letter, the possibility seems even more distant than I myself thought. It sounds all so different from what they commissioned you to say to me when you came here, and if it begins in such a way, no doubt the sequel will be worse. . . . All that you told me here about a rota among the different directors, and the duties of the Capellmeister of the Royal Chapel, and of the engagement of foreign musicians—not a word of this was brought forward; on the contrary, Masson writes to me that he is glad I have declared myself satisfied with the title and the salary, which is totally opposed to the sense of my previous letter, wherein I expressed a wish to know my duties before I could explain my intentions. Indeed, even if the alteration in the musical class were to be made exactly according to my wishes, I scarcely know (as the title is in question) whether I should quite like to go to Berlin as 'Director of the Musical Class,' which is by no means in good odour with musicians at present. I can say all this to you without incurring the suspicion of a fondness for titles, but what annoys me is their drawing back in all their proposals." In response to this letter, Paul gave Felix abundant assurance that he felt no annoyance at the composer's scruples, but intimated that probably he was acting under the advice of others. To this Felix answered in spirited, and, as regards his own nature, suggestive terms: "You must not suppose that I ever act in any affair but from my own impulses, far less in a matter in which I myself and my happiness are so very closely involved. Believe me that I invariably strive to do and say nothing but what I hold to be right in my conscience and instinct, and it is a proof that we have, alas! lived much asunder, and only met in days of enjoyment, and not of work, when you fear that I am easily swayed not only in conversation but in action. No! all goes on very slowly with me, but when at last I do a foolish thing, I have at least one merit, which is to have devised it myself." Meanwhile the Berlin business grew more unsatisfactory than ever. Von Masson sent the proposed statutes of the new institution to Mendelssohn for any suggestions he might have to make, and the composer scarcely knew whether to be angry or amused. "Remarkable, very remarkable these statutes are, especially those of the school for composition. Imagine, out of eleven different branches of instruction proposed, seven are positively useless, and, indeed, preposterous. What do you think of the following, among others? No. 8, 'The relation music bears to the other arts, especially to the plastic, and to the stage'; and also No. 11, 'A guide to the spiritual and worldly drama.' I formerly read these things in the Government paper, and laughed at them; but when a grave minister or official actually sends such stuff, it is pitiable." Notwithstanding all this, the negotiations went on. There can be no doubt at all of the fact that Mendelssohn was inclined to go to Berlin, provided his stipulations were agreed upon, and as the royal authorities were anxious to have him, a basis of agreement became only a question of time and talk. This was at last reached ad interim by a proposal made to and accepted by Mendelssohn, and thus stated in Herr von Masson's report to the King: "That for the present he (Mendelssohn) should only for a certain period fix his residence in Berlin—say, a year—placing himself at your Majesty's disposal, in return for which your Majesty should confer on him the title of Capellmeister, but without imposing on him the duties of this office in the Royal Opera; likewise the previously named salary of three thousand thalers per annum to be bestowed on him; during this time, however, he is neither to hold any office nor to undertake any definite duties, unless in the course of this period Herr Eichhorn (the Minister) should furnish him with the long-wished-for details, and he should declare himself satisfied with them, in which case the reserved consent as to a definite nomination should ensue." The report which contains this extract is dated May, 1841, but, in July, Mendelssohn was still at Leipzig and still unsatisfied, because as it seemed that the King intended to give him the title of Capellmeister only in the event of the Academy plan being carried out. The master had no idea of accepting a salary without an office, and wrote very positively in that sense to his brother Paul: "If this be his (the King's) irrevocable determination, I have only to choose between two alternatives—to go to Berlin on August 1 without the title, and without any further public appointment, merely receiving the salary there, or at once to break off all further negotiations on the matter and never to renew them." He inclined to the latter course, for reasons admirably put: "It appears to me only just that I should receive a public proof of the King's confidence; for, possibly, after the lapse of a year, no renewal of the relation may be desired on the other side, in which case I alone shall be the losing party, for they only risk conferring a title for nothing, while I lose my present situation, and you know that this costs me no small sacrifice." The difficulty thus stated was at last got over, Mendelssohn accepted the terms offered him, and on the 15th of July we find him expressing to Klingemann the half-heartedness with which, royal honour notwithstanding, he made the change from Leipzig to Berlin: "I am off for a year to Berlin—one of the sourest apples a man can eat, yet eaten it must be." The master then proceeds to correct a very natural impression entertained by his friend in London and many others: "You believe (and several of the residents here, as well as strangers, have told me the same) that in Leipzig we have comfort, domestic life, and retirement, and in Berlin, public efficacy in and for Germany and active work for the benefit of others, &c., &c., whereas it is in truth exactly the reverse. . . . I did not establish myself in Leipzig with a view to a quiet life; on the contrary, I felt a longing for it because here all is so stirring and gay. . . . That I am now about to recommence a private life, but at the same time to become a sort of schoolmaster to a Conservatorium, is what I can scarcely realise, after my excellent vigorous orchestra here. I might perhaps do so if I were really to enjoy an entirely private life, in which case I should only compose and live in retirement, but the mongrel Berlin doings interfere; the vast projects, the petty performances, the indifferent musicians, the liberal ideas, the Court servants in the streets, the Museum and the Academy and the sand. . . . Believe me, Berlin is at the present day the city which is at least efficacious, and Leipzig the most publicly influential." Feelings and opinions such as these were strong arguments against change; nevertheless, Mendelssohn's next letter is dated from the Prussian capital.

On August 9, the master, having then been in Berlin a few weeks, describes with a sort of comic puzzlement the chaotic state of affairs into the midst of which he had plunged. Nothing was settled respecting the new Academy: "The affair is on the most extensive scale, if it be actually on any scale at all and not merely in the air. . . . You will ask what in the world do they want with me just now in Berlin! My answer is, on the one side I really do not know; on the other, I believe that it is intended to give, during the winter, some great concerts, with the help of all their best means, and that I am to direct them, some in church, and some in the concert-hall, but whether they will ever take place seems to me very doubtful." In this situation Mendelssohn's discontent, augmented by the consciousness of having made a mistake, became more and more marked. We trace this in a letter to President Verkennis of Cologne, which clearly shows that the writer had no hope: "There is scarcely a place in all Germany where I feel so little at home as here. The ground of this may be that all the causes which formerly made it impossible for me to begin and continue my career in Berlin, and which drove me away, still exist, and are, alas! likely to exist to the end of time. There is the same frittering away of energy, the same unpoetical striving after outward results, the same superfluity of perception, the same failure in production, and the same want of nature, the same illiberality and backwardness as to progress and development, by which, though the latter are rendered safer, they are robbed of all merit and of all life. . . . The soil must be entirely ploughed and turned up before it can bring forth fruit, so it seems to me, at least in my department; the musicians work each for himself, and no two agree; the amateurs are divided into thousands of small circles; besides, all the music one hears is at the best only indifferent; criticism alone is keen, close, and well studied." The character of the musical performances then given in Berlin was, indeed, enough to frighten Mendelssohn back to Leipzig straightway. Here is his own description of it: "In operas and symphonies I have heard blunders and false notes constantly played which could only proceed from the grossest carelessness. The people are royal functionaries and cannot be brought to account; and if the conversation turns on these faults afterwards, they strive to prove that there is no such thing as time, or should be none—what can I say but, item, it goes badly. I have played my trio ten or twelve times here; on each occasion the same mistakes were made in the time and the same careless blunders in the execution, though they were the first artists here who played with me." Time went on, October came, and the new Academy was still "in the air." Hence Mendelssohn wrote to his friend, Hauser: "It is said the desire for it exists, and perhaps a remote prospect, but far too remote for anything to be told about it with the least certainty at present." Personally, the master had nothing to complain of: "I am so very kindly received on every side that I can wish for nothing better, and have only cause for gratitude." But he wanted to be at work, "aiding the cause," as he expressed it, which was to him, "after all, the most important point, and should be the very first." The Hauser letter ends comically: "If I only knew how to improve matters! Meanwhile I write music, and when asked a question I answer it."

A year went by, and the end of it found Mendelssohn still "hanging about" Berlin. But then, his patience having become exhausted, he wrote to Herr von Masson setting forth the state of affairs, and expressing a desire for an audience with the King, in hope of obtaining leave to carry out a plan he had formed: "My wish is that his Majesty would permit me to reside, and to work, and to await his commands in some other place, where I could for the moment be useful and efficient. As soon as the building is finished, or so soon as the King requires any service from me, I shall consider it a great happiness to hasten back and exert my best energies for such a sovereign, whose mandates are in themselves an artist's highest rewards." The fitting response to these courtly phrases was an accorded audience. The King and the composer met, and the kingly lips were graciously opened to say that it was intended to augment the Royal Chapel Choir, add instruments to the voices, and make Mendelssohn director. Meanwhile, till these changes were effected, the master was free to reside wherever he pleased. Mendelssohn answered the King by letter, begging him not to throw the burden of reorganising the choir on his shoulders, but to be content with his opinion and advice merely; stating that he meant to return, pro tem., to Leipzig, and that, while absent, he would be satisfied with half-salary. In due course the King signified his approval, and Mendelssohn forthwith turned his back on Berlin and his face towards the beloved city he had quitted fifteen months before. "I could no longer," he wrote to Klingemann, "endure the state of suspense in Berlin. There was, in fact, nothing certain there but that I was to receive a certain sum of money, and that alone should not suffice for the vocation of a musician; at least, I felt more oppressed by it from day to day, and I requested either to be told plainly that I should do nothing (with which I should have been quite contented, for then I could have worked with an easy mind at whatever I chose), or be told plainly what I was to do." A few days after this letter was written, Mendelssohn received a communication from the King in which His Majesty said: "I nominate you General Musical Director (of an Institute for the Improvement of Church Music) and intrust to you the superintendence and direction of the Church and sacred music in your appointed sphere of action." In addition, the affair of the Conservatorium began to progress, and it is not surprising to find Mendelssohn in better humour with Berlin men and things. His remarks on the honour received from the King are worth quoting: "The King having conferred on me a new title, almost embarrasses me. I am unwilling to be of the number of those who, in the present day, possess a greater number of honours than good compositions of their own, and yet it seems rather like it. At all events I really have no idea what return I can possibly make for all this; still, as I have not in any way sought it, I may be excused. To refuse such a thing is out of the question, and there is no one who does not rejoice in being overestimated, because on some other occasion, the balance is sure to be restored by depreciation."

During the first six months of 1843, Mendelssohn took an active part in establishing the Conservatorium at Leipzig, while at Berlin the "tedious, everlasting affair" crept slowly on from bad to worse. Conferences were held, and stipulations made and agreed upon only to be overridden; the advance of one day was lost the next, and the master again felt inclined, so great was his worry, to wash his hands of the whole business: "Herr von Masson has sent me a letter which irritated me so much that it almost made me ill; and I do not feel right yet. . . . Remembering your (Paul's) words, I thought it the most judicious plan to write direct to the king, and break off the affair. After two days' consideration I did not think I was justified in doing so; I therefore wrote to Herr von Masson why and wherefore I could not give my signature, requesting him to inform me whether the king intended, or not, to carry out our former agreement. If not, or if he, Herr von Masson, considered it necessary to insert new clauses in the agreement, I should then consider the affair impracticable and act accordingly. . . . I said all this in the most friendly manner possible, but I do assure you that the business cost me four most angry, disturbed, and irksome days. . . . It is really too provoking that in all and everything the same spirit prevails. In this case all might be smoothed over and set to rights by a few words, and every moment I expect to hear them spoken, when there would be a possibility of something good and new; but then they are not spoken, and they are replaced by a thousand annoyances, and my head at last is so bewildered that I think I become almost as perverted and unnatural as the affair itself is likely to prove." As usual, nothing came of the renewed negotiations, which seem to have split upon the old rock, viz., Mendelssohn's demand for powers which the authorities were not willing to grant. Till March, 1845, therefore, we find the master occupying merely an "artistic and personal relation" to the King of Prussia, and without any official duties. At the date just named, Minister Eichhorn made a fresh effort. The King, though unwilling to develop the musical section of the Academy of Arts into a Conservatorium (as Mendelssohn desired), wished nevertheless to reform the section and make of it chiefly a school of musical composition. "For this purpose," wrote Eichhorn to Mendelssohn, "it is above all expedient that a master should stand at the head of such a section who, by his own energetic creative powers, may become a guiding star for others, and thus be enabled to exercise a genuine and stimulating influence; possessing also the ability to examine critically the productions of the scholars, and by his zealous co-operation to guide them on the right path, in the very same way that, in the plastic arts, the master of the atelier stands in relation to his scholars." It is needless to add that the Minister desired Mendelssohn to accept the post, or that the master at once detected the fallacy of the notion these Berlin amateurs had formed. His reply most judiciously and clearly exposed it: "In what precisely does the practical efficacy of such a teacher consist? It is not possible to show the act of composition, as the master in an atelier shows the design of a picture or the form of a model, and, according to your Excellency's words, an intellectual influence is what is chiefly required. Such an influence, according to my conviction, is only to be obtained in the School of Art when the whole course of instruction has already laid a sound foundation, when all the teachers strive towards the same end, when no deficiency in education is overlooked, and finally when, as a keystone, all the corresponding impulses of this teaching are combined, and placed before the scholars in their practical application, and thus impressed on their minds. . . . Without this, the position, though highly honourable, would be devoid of all real practical utility. A merely general excitement, however great, can at best only call forth an unfruitful enthusiasm in the minds of the scholars, if indeed it calls forth anything whatsoever." After this the Minister held his peace, and Mendelssohn was farther than ever from Berlin. Indeed, no other attempt was made to enlist his services, though the master continued to occupy during the few remaining days of his life an "artistic and personal" relation to his royal friend and patron.

Granting, as we must, that Mendelssohn made a mistake in going against his own convictions when he listened to the Berlin proposals, we must also admire the firmness which led him to resist to the end all offers and projects that did not satisfy his own ideas of right. His artistic principles were proof against place, honours, and royalty itself.

FATHER SMITH'S ORGAN IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

By W. H. Cummings.

All that has hitherto been known respecting the organ originally built by Father Smith for St. Paul's Cathedral is to be found in "The Organ: its History and Construction," by Hopkins and Rimbault (third edition, 1877), and that account is taken from a magazine published in 1819, under the editorship of Dr. Busby. It gives various details of certain disputes between Father Smith and Sir Christopher Wren, but, unfortunately, no authorities are given, so that one is unable to decide how far the story is true or how much of exaggeration there may be in it. Dr. Rimbault has also reprinted a very curious broadside, found in the British Museum, entitled "Queries about St. Paul's Organ," which doubtless emanated from Smith's rival, the celebrated organ-builder, Renatus Harris, or from some of his partisans. The eleventh Query asks, "Whether the great Organ-builder will condescend to submit his Organ to the same Scrutiny which all Artists of the same Profession do in all Countries? And if it be deny'd whether it will not give the World, and particular the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, reason to fear that this Noli-me-tangere proceeds from some secret cause?" and the twelfth Query asks, "Whether the Cupola, or the Organ at St. Paul's, will be first finished?"

The writer of this anonymous broadside was evidently not aware of the terms of Smith's contract, by which he was bound to submit his work to be "approved by able organists," &c.

I have had the good fortune to discover the original contract; it is important as a piece of history. The document is written very clearly in a clerk's hand, on stamped paper, and is signed by "Bernard Smith" with a bold autograph. It is preceded by a minute, as follows:—

St. Pauls Church, Lond:—At a Comittee, Fryday, Octob. 19th, 1694.

Present.

Lord Major of London.	Dr. Oxenden.
Ld. Arch Bp. of Canty.	Sr. Thomas St. George.
Ld. Bp. of London.	Sr. Thomas Pinfold.
Ld. Bp. of Lincolne.	Dr. Godolphin.
Mr. Dean of St. Pauls.	Dr. Newton.
Mr. Sweetaple } Sheriffs.	Sr. Chr. Wren.
Mr. Cole }

Ordered that it be referred to the Dean and Chapter of St. Pauls and to Sr. Chr. Wren and Dr. Blowe to receive Proposalls from Mr. Smith Organ-Maker, and to treat and agree with him to make the Organ for St. Pauls.

At a Comittee, Wednesday, Decr. 19th, 1694.

Present.

Lord Bp. of London	Mr. Dean of St. Pauls.
Sr. Thomas Meres.	Dr. Newton.
Sr. Charles Hedges.	Sr. Chr. Wren.
Sr. Thomas Pinfold.	Dr. Stanley.

The following Contract was considered approved and confirmed by the Comittee abovesaid; and was Ordered to be entered in the Book of Contracts and signed accordingly.

Memd: That in pursuance of the Order first above written it was then agreed by the Dean and Chapter of St. Pauls and ye Surveyor of the Workers of St. Pauls Cathedral for and in the behalfe of the Rt. Honable. ye Lords and others Coms. for rebuilding and adorning ye said Cathedral with Bernard Smith Organ-Maker to make a large Organ containing 21 stops, part wood and part metall, and 6 halfe stops, according to Two Lists of ye said stops hereunder expressed as followeth—

The ffirst List.
Stops in the Great Organ.
Two Open Diapasons, Stop Diapason, Principall Great Twelfth, ffifteenth, Cornet, Mixtures, Sesquialtera, Trumpet.
Stops in ye Chayre Organ.
Principall, Stop Diapason, Hol fleut, Voice Humane, Crum horne.
Echoes or halfe Stops.
Diapason, Principall, Cornet, Trumpet.

The Second List.
Stops in the Great Organ.
Hol fleut, Small Twelfths.
Stops in the Chayre Organ.
Quinta Dena Diapason, Great Twelfth, ffifteenth, Cimball.
Ffifteenth, Nason.

And the said Bernard Smith doth hereby agree to make all ye said stops in Workmanlike manner together with all sound-boards, Conveyances, Movements and Bellowes thereunto appertaining and to fix ye same and tune them perfectly according to ye best of his skill in ye Case that shall be set up and provided with all Ornaments, Carvings, Gildings, and Outside painting over the Great Entrance of the Choire of St. Pauls at the Charge of ye said Coms.; the said Bernard Smith being only at ye Expence of all ye inside work,—of ye Pipes, Conveyances and Movements as afforesaid to render it a compleat Instrument, from Double F faut to C sol fa in Alt inclusive.

And the said Bernard Smith doth also Agree to set up and tune fit for use all ye stops expressed in the first of the afforesaid Lists at or before the ffive and Twentieth Day of September which shall be in ye yeare of Our Lord 1695. And the rest of the said Stops (expressed in ye Second List) at or before our Lady Day ensuing for the intire sume of Two Thousand Pounds, to be paid in manner following (that is to say) ffoure Hundred Pounds in hand (the Receipts whereof he doth hereby acknowledge), and when ye Sound-board and first Setts of Pipes (expressed in ye first of the afforesaid Lists) shall be made and provided, the further sume of One Thousand Pounds, and the residue to make up ye intire Sume, when ye said Organ shall with all ye stops be fixed in the Case provided, and shall be approved by able Organists and particularly Dr. John Blowe, Organist to their Maties. and such others as the Dean and Chapter of St. Pauls shall nominate.

In Witness whereof the said Bernard Smith hath hereunto set his hand the Day and yeare first above written.

BER: SMITH.

Witnesse.
Jo: Oliver.
Law: Spencer.
John Widdows.

The old "Smith" organ has undergone many alterations since it left his hands, and his matchless tone-work has, perhaps, met with scant reverence; still, many of his pipes exist in the present organ. I possess many pipes, portions of two stops—one metal and the other wood—removed, I think, from the "Chayre organ," when I was a boy, by the late Mr. Bishop, the organ-builder, who gave them to me at that time in response to an inquiry as to whether he would sell them.

A short time ago we drew attention in this journal to the words of many of our old songs and glees, and endeavoured to show that on the whole there was a coarse realism about them upon which—maudlin and ultra-sentimental as are some of the effusions of the present day—we have undoubtedly improved. We are by no means surprised that others should think differently from us; but one letter which we have received upon the subject so convinces us that our remarks have been misunderstood, that we cannot but place the substance of the writer's communication upon record. In a patriotic song of defiance, well-known, and even now occasionally sung, we took objection to the following words descriptive of the carnage on board of a man of war:—

See the blood in purple tide
Trickle down her batter'd side,

"but," says our correspondent, "this passage occurs almost word for word in 'Solomon,' in the song 'Can I see my infant gored,' the exact words in the Oratorio being:—

And behold the purple tide
Gushing down his tender side."

We are perfectly aware of this accidental resemblance, but our observations were not upon the words, but upon the idea conveyed by them; and surely our correspondent must see that in the first instance they express not only callous indifference of, but positive enjoyment at, the slaughter of those whom for the time being we term our "enemies"; and in the second instance they depict the heart-rending grief of a mother at the prospect of seeing her child's tortures in the agonies of death. Handel has read us a lesson in the setting of English words; and we are glad to find that the poet as well as the composer is now being criticised in notices upon musical works. Positive indifference to this matter has until lately been rather the rule than the exception; and that this indifference has not yet died out may be proved by a review of "St. Paul" in a contemporary, the writer of which speaks of the Choral "Sleepers a-wake," and the Solo "How beautiful are the messengers." To say nothing of the conversion of the last mentioned chorus into a "solo," every musician should know that the words quoted as the title of each of the above-named pieces could not be sung to the notes Mendelssohn has written.

In our daily intercourse with professional as well as amateur musicians, we are constantly asked if we have heard any more of "the bill," it appearing to be tacitly understood that by this is meant the measure which was printed during the last session of Parliament for the "Organisation and Registration of Teachers engaged in Intermediate Education in England and Wales." Our readers may remember that an article appeared in "The Musical Times" upon the subject, suggesting to Dr. Lyon Playfair, and his three coadjutors who framed the bill, the desirability of leaving out the subject of musical education altogether, considering that the art is mentioned only incidentally, in the somewhat oddly framed sentence "drawing, music, or the like." Whether the very decided opinion which was expressed upon the measure, both publicly and privately, hastened its fate, we know not; but, although a day was fixed for the second reading of the bill, no more was heard of it during the session. Now, however, we are assured that it is again to be submitted to Parliament; and, if so, we counsel those engaged in teaching to procure a copy of the bill and read it from beginning to end. We have every desire that only duly qualified professors shall be employed in tuition, but the tribunal appointed to sit in judgment upon the candidates is not one which enlists our confidence; and moreover, as the bill now stands, many well-known and competent teachers would be placed on a level with the mere student. Music, it is true, is only slightly alluded to; but let us remember that it is alluded to. Artists indeed might accept this as a compliment; for were it not specially intended that music should receive a proper share of attention, would it not have been wrapped up in that elegant expression "the like"?

It is of course impossible to insert one-half of the communications addressed to us in which the Englishman's proverbial privilege of "grumbling" is fully taken advantage of. No doubt in matters musical there are many grievances to reform; but the editor of a journal must exercise his discretion as to what subjects are of sufficient importance to be ventilated in the small space at his command for that purpose; and those correspondents, therefore, who do not see their letters in print may conclude that, although they have been passed over, they have all been duly considered. One who curtly signs himself "Gulled" has, however, struck out a new cause of complaint. He tells us that he sent for two songs (by the composer of some popular vocal pieces) which he had seen advertised, and that on receiving them he found that "the same melody was used for both." No doubt this method of manufacture saves a vast amount of trouble to the writer; but the question is whether it is fair to the purchaser. We are inclined to think not; for, even supposing that the fact were duly notified upon the title-page of each song, any person who orders them from the country could not be aware of their similarity until his order had been duly executed, when, of course, it becomes impossible to return them. The case is, as far as we know, unique. We have heard of an author writing two novels at the same time; but never of his making one story do duty for both. Originality is, we know, a rare quality; but let us hope that we may never arrive at a period when a musical composer shall multiply his works by the mere aid of the "manifold writer."

The interest taken in the Triennial Festival entirely devoted to the works of Handel, at the Crystal Palace, has in no respect diminished by frequent repetition. A programme containing a selection from the compositions of the great masters must always enlist the sympathies of a mixed audience, for in the variety of styles each section of the public is appealed to; but we are all Handel-lovers, for by his genius this composer has so intensified the words already sacred in our hearts that we have learned to look upon his works not only with admiration but with reverence. Our readers will, therefore, we are certain, receive with much pleasure, the announcement that, under the joint auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Crystal Palace Company—conducted, as usual, by Sir Michael Costa—the performances will be given at the Crystal Palace on the following days: Monday, June 21; Wednesday, June 23; and Friday, June 25; the preceding Friday, June 18, being reserved for the public rehearsal. No praise can be too great for the energy displayed by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society in furtherance of the cause they have so much at heart; yet, apart from the zeal invariably shown by the vocal executants, we cannot but feel that were it not for the untiring efforts of Sir Michael Costa, so grand a result could scarcely be attained; and we cordially congratulate the Society, as well as the general public, on the continuance of this eminent artist in a position which he has so long and so worthily maintained.

We have always been of opinion that a musical entertainment for the people, where non-intoxicating "refreshments" are permitted, will do very much more towards moral elevation than the most eloquent lectures on temperance. The "Coffee Music Hall" movement is, therefore, one in which we heartily sympathise; and as a meeting has recently taken place on the subject in the Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster, at which Dean Stanley presided, and a large number of shares were subscribed for in the room, we may reasonably conclude that the experiment will forthwith be made under most favourable circumstances. Passing over the assertion of Mr. Cowper Temple, that "the appreciation of music did not require the education that other fine arts, such as painting and sculpture, called for," we will at once allow that at first such compositions as the masses will listen to with pleasure should be given to them; and as the institution grows it may be hoped that the so-called "comic songs"—which Mr. John Hullah said he only considered dull, but which we are inclined to consider demoralising—will find no audiences disposed to nurse them into popularity. Dean Stanley and the many noblemen and gentlemen who supported him have done good work in endeavouring to provide a rational recreation for those who care not to visit a theatre; but we sincerely trust that, in the "People's Halls" of the future, at least as much attention will be paid to the quality of the music as of the coffee.

We have heard much of improving the status of organists; if any of our readers would like to know how in certain quarters their status is degraded, let them read the following advertisement, clipped from a clerical contemporary:—

WANTED, an ORGANIST, who can also take the Village Blacksmith's business. Apply, * * *.

We are curious to know whether those who framed this announcement imagine that, in order to obtain so desirable a post, any established blacksmith would endeavour to make himself competent to practise as an organist, or any established organist would endeavour to make himself competent to practise as a blacksmith. If not, it must of course be thought that it is by no means an uncommon thing to find these somewhat antagonistic qualifications already united in one individual. We cannot say that we are acquainted with a "harmonious blacksmith," or an organist with a taste for shoeing horses; but a public newspaper appeals to a large circle of readers; and should the right person be found, we would suggest the desirability of advertising for an assistant who would also perform double duty—blow the bellows for the forge in the shop on week-days, and for the organ in the church on Sundays.

MR. KUHE'S BRIGHTON FESTIVAL.

From our Special Correspondent.

Mr. Wilhelm Kuhe is one whom English musicians of all classes should delight to honour. Of the myriad toilers in the art a very small proportion can be said to possess either the inclination or the opportunity to display a spirit of self sacrifice for the interests of music in the abstract. The field of labour is infinite, but the reward is exceedingly problematical. Mr. Kuhe may be said to present an example of how steadfast persistence in one honourable course may yield no substantial result even after years of toil. A foreigner, having an extensive teaching connection in a fashionable watering place, there seemed no special reason why he should go out of his way to undertake unaided a task which elsewhere entails the formation of committees, lists of guarantors and patrons, and in fact a complete network of executive machinery. But Mr. Kuhe's enterprise does not consist merely in personally organising and superintending a musical festival of considerable magnitude. While in other quarters we hear of the difficulty of securing interesting novelties by English composers, or of the impossibility of making the pecuniary sacrifice incurred by their production, he devotes a considerable portion of his scheme to the performance of works written especially for the occasion by native composers. Is it not humiliating that a foreign musician should labour for our interests thus indefatigably while we fold our hands and reiterate a melancholy non possumus? Genius, it is true, is not to be manufactured, but if it cannot be asserted that any masterpieces of the highest rank have been given to the world by the instrumentality of Mr. Kuhe, he has enriched the repertory of our choral societies with some pleasing works, and given an impetus to young musicians to develope any latent ability they may chance to possess. The arrangements for the tenth annual Festival, of which we gave a sketch in the February number of "The Musical Times," will compare favourably with those of former years. In order, as it would seem, to invest the production of Mr. Henry Leslie's Biblical Pastoral with as much significance as possible, the work was included in the first concert, which took place on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult. The dome was well filled on this occasion, and the spectacle was brilliant and imposing. The appearance of Mr. Leslie on the platform was the signal for a burst of applause. We shall not attempt in this place an elaborate analysis of the new Cantata, but confine our remarks mainly to the effect in performance. The first impression produced by a hearing of the work is that the composer has adopted a style of extreme simplicity for divers and sufficient reasons. The term "Pastoral" seems antagonistic to lengthy and elaborate fugues, gorgeous orchestration, and studied grandeur of development. Again, it would have been shortsighted to have hazarded a comparison with Handel in his loftiest mood. And lastly, the capacity of the choral force whose task it was to interpret the music had to be taken into consideration. Here, then, is ample explanation—if explanation be needed—for the extreme modesty observed by Mr. Leslie in this instance. Parenthetically it may be remarked that the objections taken to that part of the Rev. S. J. Stone's libretto in which the shepherds are made to speak of Christ as an Avenger are ill-founded. The old Hebrew idea of the Messiah was that of a military conqueror, and the words put into the mouth of the night-watchers prior to the apparition of the angel are entirely in accordance with historic truth. Returning to the music, we cannot affirm that the opening chorus of shepherds, "It is night, still is night," was warmly received, but this apathy was doubtless due to the very imperfect singing of the male portion of the choir. The subsequent recitative and graceful air, "Low and far the echoes ring," elicited the applause due to Miss Mary Davies for her charming delivery. The slightly Handelian and very bright chorus, "Glory in heaven to God," did not display the female contingent to advantage, but the pretty pastoral subject of the next chorus, "Now to Bethlehem let us go," evidently pleased the audience. Then came the gem of the work, a recitative and air for the Virgin Mary, "O babe, my son, my Saviour." Founded on an irresistible and yet most devotional theme, and superbly sung by Miss Orridge, this air made a profound impression, and would gladly have been heard a second time. But the encore was wisely declined. The broad and church-like chorus, "Sing for Israel's golden morn"—the only number in which the male and female voices are mingled—brought the performance to a conclusion. Mr. Leslie was recalled to the platform and applauded with warmth, if not with enthusiasm. The defects of the performance were partly due to the extreme range of the voice-parts, and partly, it is to be feared, to insufficient rehearsal; for, in the far more difficult choruses in the "Lobgesang," Mr. Alfred King's forces acquitted themselves far better. As regards the performance of Mendelssohn's work it need only be further noted that Mr. Kuhe, on making his appearance to conduct, was received with loud and long-continued applause, and that the symphonic movements were admirably played by the orchestra of 48 performers. This seems a small number for such a large building, but the acoustic properties of the dome render the effect equal to that which would be gained by a far larger force in another hall. The Classical Concert of Wednesday afternoon had a comparatively scanty attendance, the female element preponderating in the ratio of about 50 to 1. In all his arrangements Mr. Kuhe evinces a determination to secure the best results at any cost, and the engagement of Mr. Manns to conduct this concert showed this in the strongest light. It would be mere waste of space to describe how such works as Schumann's Symphony in B flat, and the overtures to "Egmont" and "The Wood Nymph" were rendered under the bâton of the Sydenham conductor. The novelty of the progamme was some ballet music by Mr. Arthur H. Jackson. Three movements were given, namely, Allegro giocoso in G minor, Alla marcia in E flat, and A la valse in F. This curious consecution of keys suggests the idea that the work is as yet incomplete. The movements are clever, and remarkably well scored, especially the Alla Marcia, in which the alternate tonic and dominant in the bass has a quaint and curious effect. Mr. Jackson did not conduct his own work, as was announced in the programme. The audience maintained an impassive demeanour throughout the concert, even Mr. Kuhe's performance of Rubinstein's immensely difficult Concerto in D minor failing to arouse any special manifestation of approval. But for the presence of a few scores of persons in the shilling portion of the room, the entire performance would have been received in solemn silence. On Thursday evening Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" was given, with a strong force of principal vocalists, and on Saturday morning Sir Michael Costa's "Naaman," with the composer at the conductor's desk. On Monday, the 23rd ult., there was a "Popular" Concert, the word being partly used in the Chappellian sense, since the programme included such works as Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by M. Ovide Musin, and Oscar Raif's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, played by Miss Kuhe. At a Miscellaneous Concert on Tuesday, the new Symphony in B flat, by Mr. Walter Macfarren, was performed under the direction of the composer. To this work we shall return at the first opportunity. A new Scherzo for orchestra, entitled "Elle et Lui," by Mr. L. Engel, was also in the programme. On Thursday, Mr. Arthur Sullivan's "The Prodigal Son," Mr. E. Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor, played by Mr. Alfred King, and conducted by the composer, and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" were announced for performance. The "Popular" Concert for Mr. Kuhe's benefit on Friday, included a selection from "H.M.S. Pinafore," and several well-worn ballads, showing Mr. Kuhe's actual opinion of the tastes of the Brighton amateurs. Mr. Sims Reeves was announced to sing at this concert. Even on this occasion, however, there was one item of importance, namely a Suite Symphonique by the Earl of Dunmore. The titled amateur doubtless had a large, if not a very critical, audience. On Saturday morning the Festival was to close with a performance of "The Messiah."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

As we predicted, the Lohengrin of Herr Schott was infinitely better than his assumption of the hero in "Rienzi"; and the production of Wagner's Opera on the 7th ult. (the English version by Mr. J. P. Jackson) achieved, therefore, one of the greatest successes of the season. It can scarcely perhaps be said that the German tenor thoroughly realised every phase of the character of the mythical Knight of the Swan; but many portions, especially of the dramatic scenes, displayed both his singing and acting to the utmost possible advantage; and the instances of false intonation were so rare as scarcely to detract from the general excellence of his performance. The Elsa of Miss Julia Gaylord was so exquisitely refined in conception throughout, and the whole of her music was given with such earnest and truthful expression that, even with the recollection of Madame Albani in the part, she thoroughly won her way with the auditors, who applauded with a warmth which evidently nerved her to increased exertion as the Opera progressed. That ripeness which comes only by experience is now all that is wanted to ensure this clever young artist a permanent position in the highest ranks of the lyric drama, and that this may be assured to her by constant practice in Mr. Carl Rosa's company there can be little doubt. Miss Josephine Yorke's personation of the somewhat repulsive part of Ortrud was in many portions excellent, especially in the well-known scene with Elsa. Mr. Ludwig gave the difficult music of Telramund with good effect, Mr. Conly was satisfactory as the King, and the important phrases given to the Herald were sung by Mr. Leslie Crotty better than we have been accustomed to hear them on the Italian stage.

The production of an English version of Verdi's "Aïda" on the 19th ult., enabled Miss Minnie Hauk to assert a power, in the part of the heroine, with which many, even of her warmest admirers, scarcely credited her. That her singing would be satisfactory, notwithstanding the extreme difficulties of much of the music—which is a compound of many styles—was never doubted; but her acting, especially in the highly dramatic duet with Radames, was excellent, and thoroughly enlisted the sympathies of the audience. The singing and acting of Miss Josephine Yorke, as Amneris, invested the part with the highest amount of interest, and in many of her finely delivered declamatory passages she elicited the most enthusiastic applause. Mr. Joseph Maas has but little improved as an actor, but his singing of the whole of the music of Radames was everything that could be desired; indeed, in no part has he produced a more genuine effect as a vocalist. Again Mr. Ludwig proved himself a reliable and thoroughly competent artist in the arduous character of Amonasro; and Mr. Conly, as Ramphis, was appropriately impressive. The scenery was in every respect admirable throughout, many of the gorgeous processions, indeed, showing the result of excellent stage management. The choruses were well delivered, and the reception of the Opera (the Italian text of which has been most successfully rendered into English by Mr. Hersee) seems likely to prove that "Aïda" will form one of the most attractive pieces in Mr. Carl Rosa's répertoire. Much of the success of both the works we have noticed was undoubtedly owing to the skilful conductorship of Mr. Randegger, who must have worked hard at rehearsals to ensure so satisfactory a result. The season is advertised to terminate on the 6th inst.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The first of the Saturday Concerts, after the usual Christmas interval, was given on January 31. As that day was the eighty-second anniversary of Franz Schubert's birth, the whole programme of the afternoon was appropriately chosen from his works. The concert opened with the introduction and first Allegro of his earliest Symphony (in D, written in 1813). It was interesting to have the opportunity of comparing this first Symphony with the last—the great one in C, composed in the year of his death, 1828. The difference between the two works is hardly less remarkable than that to be observed between Mozart's earliest operas and "Don Juan" or "Figaro." Schubert's first Symphony shows but little trace of his future style; he follows somewhat closely in the footsteps of Haydn and Mozart, with an occasional glance in the direction of Beethoven. The music is of chiefly historical interest, though even at this early period Schubert's feeling for orchestral colouring is clearly to be seen. The most important numbers of the rest of the programme were a selection from the "Rosamunde" music, and the Symphony in C already mentioned. Miss Lillian Bailey and Herr Henschel sang several songs by the composer; the "Memnon" given by Herr Henschel, with Brahms's orchestration, being particularly effective.

On the following Saturday (the 7th ult.) an experiment was repeated which had been previously tried at the Palace—that of performing Mendelssohn's Octett by all the strings of the orchestra. While admitting that the work does not in the present case suffer by the alteration, and even going so far as to allow that, owing to the symphonic character of the music, some parts are even more effective than in their original shape, we must enter a protest on principle against the too prevalent practice of transferring chamber music to the orchestra. Surely the supply of Symphonies and other orchestral works is not so limited that our concert managers are forced to eke out their programmes with music intended for quite a different purpose. Having said this, it is only just to add that the performance of the Octett was magnificent. Mdlle. Janotha gave a very fine rendering at this concert of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat. Madame Sinico was the vocalist, and two very interesting numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust"—the "Danse des Sylphes" and the "Rakockzy March"—concluded the concert.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" in D minor opened the concert on the 14th. The work was first heard in London at one of the Philharmonic Concerts in 1876, and it had also been given at Sydenham at Herr Rubinstein's farewell concert in June, 1877. On neither occasion did it make a favourable impression, nor can it be said after a third performance that the work improves on a closer acquaintance. That it contains ideas of great beauty and even of real poetic charm is undeniable; but it is terribly diffuse, and in many parts extravagant, and as a whole will not compare with its composer's "Ocean" Symphony. It was magnificently played, under Mr. Manns's direction, but its reception was by no means cordial. Miss Dora Schirmacher, a young pianist who has made great progress since she was last heard at the Crystal Palace, gave a finished rendering of Beethoven's Concerto in G, and of solos by Schumann and Chopin. Mrs. Osgood sang Elizabeth's first air from "Tannhäuser" and two very pleasing songs by Miss Maude White, accompanied by the composer.

A very original and striking Overture to "King Lear," by the Italian violinist and composer, Signor Bazzini, was given on the 21st. The work, though irregular in its form, is full of power and beauty, and charmingly scored for the orchestra. A series of performances at consecutive concerts of Beethoven's nine Symphonies was commenced on this afternoon, by a fine rendering of No. 1, in C major. Herr Barth played Brahms's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, not one of the composer's most interesting works, in admirable style. The pianist possesses sufficient execution to be able to grapple with this most difficult composition, and he also plays with great taste and feeling, being equally satisfactory whether in passages requiring delicacy or power. Mr. Edward Lloyd was the vocalist, and the concert was brought to a close by a fine performance of Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Two special attractions combined to fill St. James's Hall, on the evening of the 2nd ult., to a degree unusual even at these much-frequented Concerts; these being the appearance on this occasion of Dr. Hans von Bülow, and the interpretation on the part of Madame Norman-Néruda and the eminent pianist just named of a new Sonata in G major, for pianoforte and violin, by Brahms, classed as Op. 78, and performed here for the first time. Since in the year 1853 Robert Schumann (in his journal, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik) first directed the attention of the public, with generous enthusiasm, to the then obscure young composer of twenty, the world of music has expected great things of Johannes Brahms, and it is not impossible that the prophetic praise lavished upon him by so high an authority as Schumann may have exercised an embarrassing influence upon the subsequent development of his talent. There is a certain straining after originality of expression observable in Brahms's later works, especially in his instrumental ones, together with a tendency occasionally to diffuseness and mysteriousness scarcely supported by an adequate flow of musical ideas. Nevertheless, it would be idle to deny that enough of importance has been produced by Herr Brahms to justify to a great extent the exalted opinion held by Schumann as to his future career, and in his native Germany, at all events, he is looked upon by many as the representative musician of the country, destined to carry on the ideas inaugurated by a Beethoven in the sphere of absolute music. Thus every new work from the pen of Herr Brahms commands the attention of the musical world, and perhaps raises expectations which cannot possibly be realised at a single hearing. These remarks apply to the new Sonata lately published by Herr Brahms. There were none, we are sure, amongst the audience at St. James's Hall who did not listen with delight to the admirable intrepretation of the work by the excellent artists already referred to; there were few, we venture to add, who at the conclusion of the performance did not turn with a feeling of relief to the harmonious lucidity and graceful, albeit passionate, melodiousness displayed in the succeeding instrumental number of the programme, viz., Mozart's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor. We do not presume to have formed a definite opinion as to the merits of Herr Brahms's new work after hearing it once only. We admit that some of its leading "motives" have grown upon us since the performance in question. Still, the general impression produced by the Sonata is that of a mind striving to depict in musical language an individual experience scarcely important enough to furnish the material for three movements. The Sonata is, in fact, a reminiscence or paraphrase of the composer's well-known "Regenlied," the contemplative character of which pervades the entire work, while it distinctly interconnects the first and third movements; thus marking a concession on the part of the composer to the "programme" principle generally repudiated by the musicians of his school. The Sonata will, no doubt, soon be repeated at these Concerts. Cherubini's Quartet in E flat was on this occasion heard for the eighth time here, being admirably rendered by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. The only instrumental solo performance of the evening was the masterly interpretation on the part of Dr. von Bülow of Beethoven's Adagio and Variations in F major (Op. 34), which elicited the inevitable encore, readily responded to by the performer, who gave, in addition, the Scherzo from the Sonata Op. 106 by the same composer. Mr. Barton M'Guckin was much and deservedly applauded in his singing of Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and of a somewhat insipid composition by Duvivier, entitled "The cooing of the dove," accompanied on the pianoforte by M. Zerbini.

The programme of the second evening Concert of last month (the 9th ult.) opened with Brahms's Sextet in B flat (Op. 18) and concluded with Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D major, both familiar works to the audience of the Popular Concerts; the latter, indeed, being produced on this occasion for the twentieth time. Both received an excellent interpretation, the artists engaged in the former being Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Straus, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti; and Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Straus and Piatti in the latter work. This having been the last appearance this season of the eminent lady-violinist, special marks of the favour which she has so legitimately earned were, of course, abundantly bestowed upon her. Mdlle. Janotha, who was the pianist, played with her wonted brilliancy and finish, three interesting numbers from the "Harpsichord Lessons" by Domenico Scarlatti. Mr. Santley was the vocalist, and sang in excellent style Scarlatti's air, "O cessate di piegarmi," and Gounod's "Flo messo nuove corde," as also two characteristic songs by Miss White.

Herr Joachim, after his recent triumphs achieved in Italy, appeared for the first time this season as the leading violinist on the 16th ult., the event being, as usual, marked by special demonstrations of delight on the part of an audience feeling itself completely en rapport with the great artist. Herr Joachim, it may be said without fear of contradiction, is unrivalled alike as leader of the quartet, and as the interpreter of classical solo violin music demanding that combination of the greatest technical skill with the power of penetrating into the poetic intentions of the composer, from which alone the perfect reproduction of the art-work can result. These qualities were again exhibited by the eminent violinist on the occasion referred to, in his rendering of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor, the intricate technical difficulties of which appeared to vanish under Herr Joachim's magic bow, while the chaste and noble quality of his tone in cantabile passages appealed to the sympathy of his hearers with a directness which knows no refusal. It is needless to add that the performance was enthusiastically applauded. Other numbers in the programme were Beethoven's noble Quartet for strings in E flat (Op. 74), and Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 64), in the rendering of which Herr Joachim was associated with MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Mdlle. Janotha was again the pianist, and repeated Chopin's characteristic Polonaise in F sharp minor, which that lady had introduced here for the first time earlier in the present season. Mr. Frank Boyle, who was the vocalist, possesses a fine voice of the genuine tenor quality, which appeared to advantage in his singing of an air from Handel's "Semele," and a song by Gounod.

The programme of the fourth Concert of last month (given on the 23rd ult.) included Beethoven's String Trio in G major (Op. 9); the same composer's Sonata in E flat, for pianoforte alone (Op. 29); and a Sextet in A major, for strings, by Dvorák, played for the first time here. Mr. Charles Hallé was the pianist on this occasion. Herr Joachim, who will be the leading violinist until the end of the season, was associated in the Trio with MM. Straus and Piatti, and in the Sextet with MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze, in addition to the gentlemen just named. Mr. Max Friedländer contributed vocal pieces.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first Concert of the present season was given at St. James's Hall on the 5th ult., the programme containing one work by an English composer—a Concert Overture "Hero and Leander," by Walter Macfarren—new to London, although it had already been heard at Mr. Kuhe's Brighton Festival last year. We are glad however to receive this clever and graceful composition even at second hand; for, apart from its intrinsic artistic excellence, the poetical feeling which pervades the work, and the delicacy of the instrumentation, may be accepted as a protest against that tendency to exaggeration and intolerable diffuseness which characterise so many compositions of the day. The Overture was well played, and the composer called on and warmly greeted at the conclusion. Herr Goetz's "Spring Overture," although containing some excellent instrumentation and many striking passages, suggests to us in no respect the feeling of its title; but as the work of one who has made a name in this country by his Opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and also by his Symphony in F minor, it claims a fair right to a hearing by a Philharmonic audience. Signor Piatti's Violoncello Concerto has been performed at one of the Crystal Palace Concerts, where its exceptionally fine rendering by the composer, as on the present occasion, secured for it an enthusiastic reception. The programme also included an admirable performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor by Madame Montigny-Rémaury, and Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7. The vocalist was Miss Robertson, who was very successful in Weber's dramatic Concert Scena ed aria, "Non paventar mia vita." At the second Concert, on the 19th ult., a very clever Overture by Mr. Harold Thomas, called "Mountain, Lake, and Moorland," was played for the first time, and achieved a well-merited success. Mr. Thomas has hitherto been chiefly known as a writer for his own instrument, the pianoforte; but the skill displayed in the instrumentation of his Overture proves that, had he been granted in his own country that hearing so freely accorded to foreigners, he might ere this have made a name as an orchestral composer. The themes, too, are melodious and appropriate, and the design of the work is effectively laid out. Herr Scharwenka's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor has already been commented upon, when played by Mr. Dannreuther, and afterwards by the composer, at the Crystal Palace. The second movement, as before, created the greatest effect; and the excessive difficulties of the piece (surmounted with the greatest ease by Herr Scharwenka) seemed to excite the audience even more than the composition itself. The programme also included Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and the Overtures, "The Naiades" (Bennett), and "Der Freischütz" (Weber). The vocalists were Mr. Shakespeare and Mr. Santley. At both the Concerts under notice Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

Apart from the attraction of an excellent programme, there was a special interest attached to the first Concert of the present season, on the 12th ult., because the rumours of a dissolution of this Choir had become confirmed by a public announcement that, after the four Subscription Concerts of this year, an institution which has so honourably maintained its high position in this country for twenty-five years will cease to exist. That St. James's Hall was crowded in every part may be readily imagined; and we sincerely trust that the warm greeting accorded to Mr. Henry Leslie on his appearance in the orchestra will convince him that his earnest labours in the advancement of choral singing in England have been thoroughly appreciated. The selection for the evening included some of the greatest successes of past seasons, the programme (in consequence of the concert occurring during Lent) being restricted to sacred music. Bach's Motett, "Sing ye to the Lord," Mendelssohn's Psalm, "Judge me, O God," and Schubert's Psalm, for female voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd," were amongst the finest examples of the exceptional powers of the Choir, the difficulties of Bach's Motett being surmounted with an ease which amply proved how thoroughly the members of the class, as well as the Conductor, must have had their heart in the work. Dr. Pole's excellently written Motett for a double choir (the 100th Psalm), a Kyrie by Leonardo Leo, a new and graceful part-song "Homeward," by Mr. Leslie (the charming writing of which produced such a marked effect upon the audience as to compel the Conductor to repeat it), and Mr. Gaul's part-song, "The Better Land," were also given with that strict attention to every shade of expression which has earned for this body of vocalists so enviable a celebrity both at home and abroad. The solo vocalists were Madame Patey, who gave, with her usual success, a song by the Conductor, "I saw a golden sunbeam fall," and Gounod's "There is a green hill"; and Mr. Joseph Maas, who showed but small traces of his recent indisposition in his rendering of Handel's recitative and air, "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her angels," which created a marked effect, and who also gave (but with scarcely similar success) the same composer's "Every valley," with the preceding recitative, and "Refrain thy voice," from Sullivan's "Light of the World." The Concert was, as usual, conducted by Mr. Leslie. The three remaining Subscription Concerts of the season will take place on the 5th inst., May 7, and June 2; an extra Concert being announced, "by desire," on Saturday morning, June 19. At the next Concert, Mendelssohn's music to "Antigone" will be given. The Lyrics will be abridged still more than at the last performance, and will be read by Miss Tennyson, a member of Mr. Leslie's Choir; a Suite for violin, unaccompanied, by J. S. Bach, will also be given, and Herr Joachim will perform Beethoven's Violin Concerto. The third Concert, of choral music, at which Madame Albani will appear, and the fourth, of English music, at which Mr. Santley is announced, have, as yet, no published programme. The Grand Festival Concert, which is advertised for "the end of June or early in July," will be the very last at which the Choir will be heard; and as it is evident that this decision is irrevocable, we can only express a hope that some delicately trained and perfectly organised body of vocalists may grow up in place of that which now bids us farewell, and assure the members of the retiring Choir that they have not only bequeathed to us a valuable lesson, but that they leave behind them a reputation which will not easily die out.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

We have still briefly to refer to the Recital of pianoforte music given by this consummate artist on the afternoon of January 28, too late for its being noticed in our previous number. The programme on this occasion was of a varied character, commencing with Bach and concluding with Rubinstein, thus affording ample opportunity to the pianist for the display of his versatile powers of expression, his marvellous executive skill, and his no less marvellous retentive powers. All these, however, are qualities with which amateurs have long since become familiar in connection with Dr. von Bülow, and need not therefore be specially pointed out in his rendering of the different numbers of the interesting programme under notice, which was composed as follows: Bach's English Suite, No. 6, in D minor; Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 31, No. 3); Brahms's Capricci ed Intermezzi (Op. 76); Three Pieces by Chopin; Liszt's "Venezia e Napoli," Canzone e Tarantella, and Rubinstein's Barcaroles (Op. 45 and 93); and Galop from "Le Bal." There was a comparatively small but enthusiastic audience, many having doubtless been prevented from attending on account of the inclemency of the weather.

THE ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF MUSIC FOR THE BLIND.

This Institution, founded in 1872, has on more than one occasion given practical proof of the efficiency of its work; and the latest evidence of the talents and industry of its pupils was exhibited at a Concert given, by permission of the Lord Mayor, at the Mansion House on the 18th ult., when the sympathies and admiration of a crowded audience were fully elicited by the performance of a lengthy programme of music selected from many schools of composition, including Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, Raff, Gade, and Brahms. That the students, male and female, had been trained in a thoroughly sound and musician-like manner by the eminent professors attached to the College, was thoroughly demonstrated by the various instrumental and vocal performances, solo and concerted. All were most excellent and praiseworthy; but especial mention must be made of the part-singing, which might challenge comparison with that of any choir, however celebrated. The violin playing of H.H. Prince Alexander of Hesse, one of the pupils of the College, exhibited a broad and sympathetic tone, giving promise of future excellence. The solo performers were numerous, including Misses Dick and Campbell, soprani; Reece and Carson, contralti; Messrs. Wilmot, tenor; Schwier and West, bassi; Miss Stewart and Master Schwier, pianists; the latter performing in a remarkable manner the difficult pianoforte part in a quartet by Raff (Op. 202).

It is to be hoped that the Principal and Director of the College, Mr. F. J. Campbell, will receive a large and liberal support from all who have hearts to feel for their kind, and means to help a noble work which ought to be thoroughly and satisfactorily developed. At present the College has ample accommodation for 60 or 70 more pupils, and the candidates for admission are so numerous that were scholarships provided the vacancies could be immediately filled.

A highly interesting lecture on "Old Violins" was given at the Royal Institution on the 20th ult., by the Rev. H. R. Haweis, before a large and appreciative audience. The lecturer began by saying that the collection of violins and basses then before the audience, weighing but a few ounces each, represented several thousands of pounds in value. "To begin with the wood; at Brescia makers used pear, lemon, and ash; at Cremona, maple, sycamore, and, of course, pine. The wood came into the markets of Mantua, Brescia, Cremona, Venice, Milan, from the Swiss Southern Tyrol, unlimited in supply, often mighty timbers of great age—plentiful then, scarcer now. The makers had their pick; they tested it for intensity and quality. Cut strips of wood and strike them, you will see how they will vary in musical sound. When a good acoustic beam was found the maker kept it for his best work. In Joseph Guarnerius and Stradiuarius the same pine tree crops up at intervals of years. A good maker will patch and join and inlay to retain every particle of tried timber. Old wood is oddly vocal." Taking a violin and tearing it open the lecturer continued: "The violin is made of fifty-eight or seventy pieces. It is a miracle of construction. It is as light as a feather and as strong as a horse. Wood about as thick as a half-crown, by exquisite adjustment, resists for centuries a pressure of several hundred-weight. The belly of soft deal, the back of hard sycamore, are united by six ribs of sycamore, supported by twelve blocks with linings. The sound-bar running obliquely under the left foot of the bridge is the nervous system of the violin, the sound-post supporting the bridge is the soul, through it pass all the heart-throbs or vibrations generated between the back and the belly; on its position depends mellowness, tightness, or intensity of sound. The prodigious strain of the strings is resisted first by the arch of the belly, then by the ribs, strengthened with the upright blocks, the pressure among which is evenly distributed by the linings which unite them, and lastly by the supporting sound-bar and sound-post and back." After describing the other parts of the instrument, Mr. Haweis alluded to the Cremona varnish, which he described, after Mr. Charles Reade, as probably a heterogeneous varnish, first of oil with gum in solution, then of colour evaporated in spirit. Although it was said that the secret was now lost, Dod, as late as 1830, who employed the Fendts and Lott and always varnished himself, had the recipe for something very like the Cremona varnish; and lately Mr. Perkins has not only analysed the varnish of Joseph Guarnerius and found amber in it, but has himself produced varnish of an extraordinary quality. The violin is not an invention, it is a growth; it has come together, it is the survival of the fittest. About the eleventh century an instrument of the viol tribe emerged with frets, but 150 years were required to get rid of these marplots before even a step towards the true viol could be made. Before the end of the fourteenth century viols were made in great profusion of every size and shape. But the rise of the true violin tribe begins with the rise of modern music. After illustrating the qualities of the four-stringed instrument, Mr. Haweis alluded in detail to the schools of Brescia and Cremona. "Although here is an antique Duiffoprugcar (1520), the great Italian creators of the violin date, not from Mantua or Bologna, but from Brescia. Gaspar di Salo, 1560-1610, brought down the tubby German viol and struck a more elegant outline and proportion. He was almost the inventor of violin sound; beneath his flat-toned bellies and rounded backs the muffled sob began to vanish and the tone is loud and full. Maggini, 1590-1640, curried on the flat form, lowering his ribs; his tone is somewhat crisper and sweeter than Gaspar. The Maggini model passed into the hands of Andreas Amati, 1520-80, who had had ample opportunity as a contemporary maker of old viols to study the Brescian models, and while adopting their gaping sound holes and drooping corners, reverted to the raised model, and thus retarded the triumph of the Cremona sound. It may be that the new loud fiddles seemed harsh to the monks, and wanting in mellowness after the soft old viols; but the charm of power once intuitively grasped by the Brescians, along with the flatter model, only wanted the intelligence of Jerome Amati, who again brought down his violin bellies, leaving his brother Anthony in the old ways. Still the violins by the brethren, Jerome dominating, are highly prized. Unfortunately they brought in the scoop on either side of the bridge, weakening the belly, and weakening if (as it is said) sweetening the tone. The later Amati, however, narrowed the Brescian sound-holes, thus retaining and prolonging their vibrations. Nicholas Amati, 1596-1684, who never quite shook off the scoop, by inventing the 'grand' pattern, a long-shaped instrument with pointed corners, paved the way for his great pupil, Antonius Stradiuarius." After a brief account of Stradiuarius, Mr. Haweis alluded to his four periods, which he said, ran into each other. "For thirty years this extraordinary man was content to work under the acknowledged influence of N. Amati. In 1668 he sets up for himself, but copies Nicholas till 1686; from 1686-94 his form fluctuates, but inclines to the earlier Brescian model (not in the corners), grows flatter, corners bold and full of character. In 1687 he makes the long or rather narrow model, which he did not adhere to. In 1700-3 he enters on his golden period after countless experiments. The last trace of the Amati scoop has disappeared. Some of his finest violins of the 'grand' pattern were made 1720-25. They have all the grace and boldness of a Greek frieze drawn by a master's hand. The arch of the belly, not too flat nor too much raised, is the true natural curve of beauty; on each side the undulating lines, as from the bosom of a wave, flow down and seem to eddy up into the four corners, where they are caught and refined away into these inimitable angles. The scroll is strong and elegant, the sound-holes exquisitely cut. The varnish is not hard and silicate, but mellow as amber or sunlit water. There is a violin of 1736, bearing date and name; it was made in the master's ninety-second year. He made down to the last, but latterly seldom signed his work." Mr. Haweis then alluded briefly to the other Italian schools of Venice, Naples, &c., and then passed to the French school, dwelling on Pique and Lupot, 1758-1824; the German school, showing a specimen of Jacob Stainer, 1684, but slightly touched with the Cremonese influence; the English Amati Banks, Foster, and Duke, and calling attention to the fact that while France clave to Cremona from the first, England adopted the popular German Stainer for nearly 100 years before returning to the Italian model. Mr. Haweis closed the lecture by some practical illustrations on the sound of the violin, playing a few passages on several violins to illustrate their different qualities.

On Monday, the 9th ult., the Highbury Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Dr. J. F. Bridge, gave its second Concert for the season 1879 80. The aim of the Society has been for some time past, under the advice of Dr. Bridge, to produce, as the pièces de résistance at their Concerts, works which have seldom, if ever, been performed in London before; and the recent Concert was no exception to this rule. The first part commenced with Romberg's Ode, "The Harmony of the Spheres." This work was well and carefully performed, the band showing a great improvement upon the last Concert, the only fault being a little roughness in the connecting symphonies and the pianissimo passages. The solo was well given by Madame Suter, and the choruses were effectively sung. The rest of the first part was miscellaneous, and included, inter alia, the song "Guinevere" (Sullivan), pathetically rendered by Mrs. Bradshawe McKay; solos by Mr. Sidney Tower and Mr. W. G. Forington; "Loose the sail," part-song by Dr. Bridge, the delicate lights and shades of which were well observed by the choir; and Bishop's glee, "Now by day's retiring lamp." Mrs. C. J. Birch gave an admirable performance of Weber's Concertstück. The second part of the Concert consisted entirely of Sullivan's Cantata, "Kenilworth: a Masque of the Days of Queen Elizabeth." The Cantata opens with an instrumental introduction and chorus, welcoming the queen to Kenilworth; afterwards the music of the entertainments given to her, a pageant and a play, respectively; and, by way of finale, a solo and chorus in the nature of a serenade. There is a slow dance with burthen in the music of the pageant, and a brisk dance immediately before the finale: these, with the introduction, were well executed by the orchestra. Madame Suter, as the Lady of the Lake, in the pageant, gave with considerable effect the solo, "I have slept beneath the water"; and Mr. Forington was loudly applauded in the song of Arion, "I am a ruler on the sea." The duet of Jessica and Lorenzo, in the play scene, was sung in capital style by Madame Suter and Mr. Sidney Tower; and the chorus, "Sleep, great queen," brought to an end what was certainly the best Concert yet given by this Society.

From the published list of subjects for competition at the National Eisteddfod of Wales, to be held at Carnarvon in August next, we find that for the best rendering of "See from His post" (Handel's "Belshazzar"), and the last chorus from the "Stabat Mater," a prize of £150 and gold medal is offered. This contest is limited to choirs of not less than 100 and not more than 150 voices. Two other prizes—one of £25 and silver medal, and one of £15—are offered for competition by smaller choirs. Prizes are also offered for solo vocal competitions—soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass. Twenty pounds and medal is the prize offered for the best execution of "Selections from 'Maritana'" by brass bands, and a smaller reward is held out as an inducement to orchestral (octuor) bands to compete in the performance of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March." In the instrumental solo department we find a twenty-five guinea harmonium (given by Mr. G. L. Bauer, London), offered for the best performance on the pianoforte of Sterndale Bennett's "Toccata," by amateurs under twenty-one years, resident or natives of the Principality. Similar restrictions govern the harmonium competition, the prize being a harmonium, value £15, given by Mons. Vivot, of Paris. There is a small prize also offered to children under twelve years of age for piano-playing. Contests on the pedal and triple harps, on the violin, and on the cornet, complete the list in this class. For musical compositions we find £15 and gold medal promised for the successful Motett on Psalm lxvii.; prizes are also offered for a Glee and Quintet for strings. We should not omit to state that the whole of the musical subjects, with the exceptions above noted, are open to all comers. The Eisteddfod this year is under the presidency of Lord Penrhyn, and the list of vice-presidents includes the names of the principal noblemen and gentlemen connected with the Principality. The Pavilion, at Carnarvon, built at an expense of £10,000, and capable of accommodating over 8,000 people, is the building in which the competitions will be held; and we are informed that an unusually successful series of meetings is anticipated.

The prospectus of Herr Ganz's five Orchestral Saturday Afternoon Concerts, at St. James's Hall, announces the performance of a selection from the following works, some of which will be heard for the first time in London: Serenade in E major, Op. 36 (Ignaz Brüll). "Concert Overture" (MS.) in A major (Michael W. Balfe). Polonaise in D major (Auguste Dupont). Violin Concerto in F sharp minor, performed by Mons. Emile Sauret (Heinrich Ernst). Overture to "Penthesilea," Op. 31 (Carl Goldmark). Violin Concerto (MS.) in G major, performed by Herr Hugo Heermann (Hermann Goetz). A, Andante, in E flat; b, "Tarantelle," for pianoforte and orchestra, performed by Madame Montigny-Rémaury (L. M. Gottschalk). Festival Overture, Op. 30, dedicated to the Orchestra of the Grand Ducal Opera, at Mannheim (Vinzenz Lachner). "Chaconne et Rigodon d'Aline" (Monsigny). Fifth Concerto for the Pianoforte (composed expressly for Mr. Ganz's Orchestral Concerts), performed by the Composer (Camille Saint-Saëns). Symphony No. 2, in C minor, Op. 134 (Carl Reinecke). Fantasia (Präludium, Intermezzo, and Fugue), Op. 79 (Josef Rheinberger). Symphony in F major, No. 1, Op. 40; "Overture-Triomphale," Op. 43, dedicated to the Emperor Alexander of Russia; "Liebeswunder," song, the poetry by Victor Hugo, and "Mignon und der Harfner," from Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister," for soprano and baritone, Op. 91, No. 7 (Anton Rubinstein). Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III," Op. 68 (Volkmann). Selection from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg;" "Siegfried-Idyll;" "Albumblatt," for solo violoncello and orchestra, and "Träume," for solo violin and orchestra (Richard Wagner). Hector Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy," will be also performed during the season. The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Pollitzer, Mr. Ganz will be the Conductor, and arrangements are being made for the appearance of the most eminent artists. The first Concert takes place on April 17.

We have to record the death of Mr. G. J. Lambert, Organist of Beverley Minster for fifty-eight years, viz., from 1818 to 1876, who died at his residence, Highgate, Beverley, on Saturday morning, January 24, aged eighty-five years. He was born at Beverley on November 16, 1794. His father, who died on July 15, 1818, was Organist forty-one years, according to the epitaph on his tombstone in the graveyard, near the north entrance of the Minster, so that the office of Organist of this beautiful edifice was held by father and son for the almost unprecedented period of ninety-nine years. The late Mr. Lambert studied under Dr. Crotch, and was not only an excellent and talented Organist, but a fine violoncello and violin player. His compositions include overtures, instrumental chamber-music, organ fugues, pianoforte pieces, &c. Although some of his quartets were played at the meetings of the Society of British Musicians, and much admired, he could never be induced to publish any of them. Previous to the interment, which took place at the private burial-ground in North-Bar Street Within, on January 28, a Choral Service was held in the Minster at eleven o'clock, at the conclusion of which Beethoven's Grand Funeral March was played by Mr. Camidge, the present Organist. The newly-appointed Incumbent (the Rev. C. E. Lamb) read the service at the grave, after which the hymn, "Jesus lives," was sung by the Minster Choir, and thus was the venerable Organist consigned to his last resting-place. On the afternoon of the funeral a muffled peal was rung on the bells of the Minster, as a token of respect to the departed.

The programmes of the nine Concerts to be given, under the conductorship of Herr Hans Richter, at St. James's Hall during the coming season are now announced, and will include, amongst others, the following works: Symphonies, No. 1, in C; No. 2, in D; Eroica; No. 4, in B flat; No. 5, in C minor; Pastoral Symphony; No. 7, in A; No. 8, in F; and the Choral Symphony (Beethoven). Faust-Overture; Siegfried-Idyll; and Overture to "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner). Hunnenschlacht, and Faust-Symphony (Liszt). Symphony, No. 9, in C, and No. 8, in B minor (Schubert). Symphony, No. 3, in D minor (Schumann). Concert-Overture, (Henschel). Symphony (Haydn). Carnival Romain, (Berlioz). Symphony, No. 2, in D (Brahms). Symphony (Mozart). Serenade, No. 1 (Fuchs); and Prelude and Fugue, No. 4, in D minor (J. S. Bach), arranged for orchestra by J. J. Abert. The orchestra will consist of 100 performers. Herr Hermann Franke will be Leader, and Herr Theodor Frantzen Conductor of the Choral Rehearsals. The first Concert will take place on Monday, the 10th May. Negotiations with solo artists are pending, but no names are as yet mentioned.

The sixth Annual Entertainment of the Violin Class took place at the Birkbeck Institution on the 14th ult. The playing of the class in an arrangement of Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March, and in an original composition by S. Jarvis, was warmly applauded, and reflected much credit on Mr. Fitzhenry, under whose direction the Concert took place. The vocal portion of the programme was furnished by Miss Elène Webster, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom acquitted themselves so much to the satisfaction of the audience that several encores could not be resisted. The violin solos of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse were, as usual, received with great applause; and readings by Mr. Charles Fry and Mr. Charles Rendle were given with such spirit and excellent style as to cause them to be enthusiastically encored. Miss Gatehouse and Mr. S. Jarvis played the pianoforte accompaniments, and Messrs. Furber and Allan (viola), and Messrs. Christen and Kendall (violoncello), likewise rendered good service.

An Entertainment was given by the Society of Old Caledonians, on the 17th ult., in the hall of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, to the children of the Institution. J. Lawrie, Esq., presided. Dissolving views of the principal events in the Zulu war were exhibited, with descriptive readings by Mr. T. Inglis, selections being played by the juvenile band of the Institution, conducted by Mr. Mansfield. A selection of vocal music followed, including many favourite pieces, and the children sang a number of songs and choruses, including "The children of the thistle," "Far away" (charmingly rendered by the girls), "Ye banks and braes," and "Hearts of oak" (given in excellent style by the boys). The boy pipers also played some lively airs. It was stated that Mr. Donald Mackay, piper to the Prince of Wales, has received the commands of H.R.H. to become the honorary piper to the Society.

The following is the result of the recent public examinations for diplomas in music at Trinity College, London:—Licentiates in Music: James Conway Brown, A. Mus., T.C.L., Farnham; Harry Alfred Harding, Mus.B., New College, Oxford; James Turpin, Mus.B., University of Cambridge. Associates in Music: William Brotherton, Bishop Auckland; William George Waller Goodworth, Trinity College; Edward Hurren Harding, London; Theophilus Hemmings, Trinity College; Rev. William James Mann, M.A., S.C.L., Queen's College, Oxford; Kate Warburton, Southport; Laura Marion Watts, Trinity College. The Examiners were Philip Armes, Mus.D.; Lennox Browne, F.R.C.S., Edin.; F. E. Gladstone, Mus.D.; Edward J. Hopkins, L. Mus., T.C.L.; Sir Herbert Oakeley, M.A., Mus.D.; Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, M.A., Mus.D.; and Llewelyn Thomas, M.D., L.R.C.P. Edin.

The following announcement respecting the Examinations for Degrees in Music at the University of Oxford (signed by Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, Professor of Music at the University), has been forwarded to us for publication:—"Examination for the degree of Doctor in Music. This examination will be holden in October next. Second Examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music. This examination will be holden in October next. In addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of—I. The Kyrie and Credo, Beethoven's 'Mass in C.' II. The Overture, 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' Mendelssohn. All exercises are to be sent to the Professor of Music, St. Michael's, Tenbury, as early as possible. None can be received after the end of June."

The Lenten Services at St. Anne's, Soho, have, as usual, included Bach's "Passion" (St. John), which has been sung each Friday evening with full orchestral accompaniment. The solos have been rendered by Master Andrews (soprano), Master Reid (alto), Mr. Charles Wade (tenor), Messrs. F. Wade and J. Berwick Orgill (bass), and the violoncello obbligato to the air "It is finished" was admirably played by M. Libotton. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis have been sung each evening to Tours's setting in F. Mr. Barnby has conducted, and Mr. J. Munro Coward has presided at the organ. H.R.H. the Princess of Wales was present at the first service, on the 13th ult. The services will be continued each Friday evening during Lent, that on Good Friday commencing at 4 p.m.

The first Concert of the second season of the London Musical Society will be given at St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, April 15, when the following works will form the chief items in the programme: "Requiem Mass" (C minor), Cherubini; "Narcissus" (first time of performance), J. Massenet; and "Jupiter March" ("Polyeucte," act iii.), Ch. Gounod. A programme so well selected may be accepted as an earnest that the Society fully intends to carry out the object for which it was formed—that of giving works but seldom heard in this country; and we are certain that its proceedings will be watched with much interest by all who desire that English audiences shall be made acquainted with compositions of acknowledged merit, wherever and whenever they may have been produced. The second Concert will be given on Thursday evening, June 17.

On January 27, the London Church Choir Association held a District Festival at Hampstead Parish Church, when the Choir consisted of 200 voices selected from the choirs of St. Anne's, Highgate Rise, St. Botolph, Aldersgate, Christ Church, Brondesbury, Hampstead Parish Church, S. Saviour, Haverstock Hill, and West Hackney Parish Church. The music sung was Gadsby's Anthem, "Not unto us, O Lord," and Berthold Tours's Service, with special Psalms and Hymns. Mr. James Shaw, Organist to the church, presided at the organ, and Mr. J. R. Murray, the hon. Choirmaster to the Association, conducted. Prayers were intoned by the Rev. Thomas Helmore, M.A., and the sermon preached by the Rev. A. Ainger, Reader at the Temple.

The Grosvenor Choral Society gave a performance, with full orchestra, of Henry Smart's "The Bride of Dunkerron," and J. G. Callcott's "The Golden Harvest," on Friday, the 20th ult. The choir, numbering about 100 voices, sang capitally throughout, and Madame Worrell, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. E. J. Bell gave the music of "The Sea Maiden," "Dunkerron," and the "Sea King" respectively, with great spirit. "The Golden Harvest" is a composition of a much lighter description, and formed an admirable contrast to Henry Smart's dramatic work. The tenor song, "True love," excellently sung by Mr. Guy, and the "Reapers' song" and "Country dance," by the choir and band, were redemanded. Mr. S. Dean Grimson led the band, and Mr. Henry Baker conducted.

The St. John's Choral Society, Upper Holloway, gave an evening Concert on Friday, the 5th ult., at St. John's Schoolrooms. The first part comprised Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata "The Legend of St. Cecilia," the solos being interpreted by Mdlle. Avigliana, Mrs. Bradshaw McKay, Mr. Henry Taylor, and Mr. Theodore Distin. The choruses were, on the whole, well rendered. Mr. David Beardwell, A.R.A.M., conducted, and the Prelude, Funeral March, and accompaniments were played by Mr. Frank Manly, R.A.M., and Mr. Oscar Kronke (piano), and Mr. Charles Stiles (harmonium). The second part was miscellaneous.

Mr. Alexander J. Ellis, F.R.S., will, on the 3rd inst., before the Society of Arts, read his paper on "The History of Musical Pitch," on which he has been engaged for two and a half years. It will contain very curious historical facts connected with musical pitch from A.D. 1361 to the present day, comprising over 300 pitches, which will be fully detailed, authenticated, and illustrated, and also the results of entirely new observations on the compass of the human voice collected from about 600 chorus-singers, with an account of recent modes of measuring musical pitch, especially by Scheibler's forks, and the methods of Professors McLeod and Mayer.

Under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Holmes the All Saints' Choral Society's first Concert was given at the Institute, Priory Grove, Clapham, on Tuesday evening, January 27. Among other compositions the programme included Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," and upon the whole the performance may be considered very commendable for a new and as yet small Society. The soloists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Rose Barnby, Miss Marian Burton; Messrs. Arthur Thomas, James Budd, and G. S. Graham. The Concert was in aid of the Organ Fund of the Church from which the Society takes its name, and where Mr. Holmes is organist.

An interesting Recital was given on the 2nd ult., at St. George's Hall, by M. Marlois, assisted by Miss Adam and Signor Guido Papini (violin). The special feature in the programme was the introduction of Messrs. Pleyel, Wolff and Co.'s new Pedalier. This instrument has a separate set of strings underneath the pedals, and can be used for organ practice with any pianoforte. M. Marlois played Bach's Prelude in B minor, the Grand Prelude and Fugue in G minor, and, with Miss Adam, Saint-Saëns' Variations for two pianos on a Theme by Beethoven. Signor Papini's playing was highly appreciated.

On Tuesday, the 10th ult., Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was performed for the second time in the old parish church of St. James's, Clerkenwell. The soloists were Miss Emily Paget, R.A.M., Miss London, and Miss Martin, R.A.M. The chorus comprised the ordinary choir of the church, assisted by a large number of Mrs. Weldon's Choral Society. The work was admirably performed, under the conductorship of Mr. James Robinson. The Rev. J. A. Nash, senior curate of the church, recited the poem, and Mr. W. T. L. Robinson, son of the organist, ably presided at the organ.

Mr. Thomas Nettleship gave a successful Concert at Angell Town Institute, Brixton, on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., before a comparatively large audience. The bénéficiaire, who was warmly received, contributed three solos, and was also associated with Messrs. T. P. Frame, J. H. Maunder, and Henry Baker, in various part-songs, &c. The other artists were Miss Berrie Stephens, Madame Worrell, Miss Matilda Roby, and Miss Marian Burton; Messrs. Arthur Weston, and Frank Augarde (violinist). Mr. Maunder acted as accompanist, and a pianoforte solo was executed by Miss Ada Frame.

We understand that an influential committee has been formed for the purpose of raising funds to present a testimonial to Mr. Henry Leslie, in consideration of his zealous efforts during a quarter of a century in the cause of choral singing. The form which this testimonial will assume is to be decided by the General Committee, at a meeting specially convened to discuss the question; and in the meantime remittances—which we have no doubt will realise a highly satisfactory sum as the season advances—are to be sent to John Leader, Esq., 84, New Bond Street.

A most successful performance of Mr. Ad. Gollmick's "Heire of Linne" was given by the Kilburn Musical Association on Tuesday, the 17th ult., at the Kilburn Town Hall. The work has many effective points, and was most favourably received. The solos were admirably sustained by Madame Liebhart, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Bernard Lane, Signor Adelman, and Mr. Orme. The second part was miscellaneous. Miss F. Gollmick ably presided at the piano, and Mr. Ad. Gollmick conducted.

We are glad to hear that the Managers of Aske's School for Girls, Hatcham, have awarded a Leaving Exhibition of ten pounds a year for three years to Eliza Goodchild (who gained the highest scholarship last July awarded by Professor Macfarren), as a reward for her excellent conduct and diligence, and to mark their approbation and assist in prosecuting her musical studies.

At the first Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music at the University of Oxford, the following satisfied the Examiners: Cockle, G., Exeter College and South Kensington, S.W.; Popham, the Rev. V. W. (M.A.) Exeter College and Bedford; Walter, H., Charsley's Hall and Higham, Rochester.

Mr. G. S. Graham gave his fifteenth Annual Concert at Angell Town Institute, Brixton, on Thursday evening, the 12th ult., assisted by Miss Mary E. Webb, Madame Lansdell-Sims, Mr. James Budd, Mr. F. C. Bevan, Mr. Tom Adams, and "The Surrey Orpheus Glee Quartet." The attendance was good.

The South Norwood Orchestral Society's second Concert of this season was held on Tuesday, the 17th ult., in the Public Hall, South Norwood, under the conductorship of A. M. Hirschfeld, Esq., Mrs. Brett (amateur) kindly acting very efficiently as pianist and vocalist.

Mr. Worsley Staniforth, on the occasion of his giving up the position of Organist at St. Paul's, Regent's Park, has been presented with a handsome Testimonial by the members of the Choir.

In consequence of the dangerous illness of Mr. W. de M. Sergison, the Lenten performances of Bach's "Passion" at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, have been unavoidably postponed.

The Daily Telegraph of the 24th ult. announces the death at Berlin of the second son of Mendelssohn, aged forty years.

Perhaps the most encouraging feature in the musical activity of the present epoch is the vast extent covered by the workers in the art. Whilst some are busily engaged in discovering fresh points of departure, others evince equal zeal in reopening the treasures buried beneath the accumulated weight of centuries. If attention were exclusively devoted to either branch of artistic enterprise, there would be ample ground for anxiety; but so long as the movement towards increased intellectuality goes hand in hand with enlightened veneration for the past, it is possible to maintain a feeling of complacency towards the harmonious influences thus labouring simultaneously in the cause of true progress. Among those who have devoted their lives to the task of rehabilitating the masters of former ages with the glory which should be their due, Dr. Friedrich Chrysander holds a foremost place. His fervid admiration of Handel, and the splendid monument he is raising in the German Society's edition of Handel's works, of which he is the editor, are sufficiently well known to musicians. It is equally understood that his sympathies extend backwards rather than forwards from the time of the Saxon composer, and hence we may consider the publication of the volumes named above as a labour of love to a musician so conservative in his tendencies. As regards the first in the order named, Dr. Chrysander merits hearty thanks for directing attention to the works of one who certainly should not live only in the estimation of the few possessing extensive musical libraries. Giacomo Carissimi flourished nearly a century prior to Handel and Bach, but much of his music would be found effective in the concert-room even at the present day. It is lamentable that an immense quantity was destroyed at the period of the Jesuit persecutions, but enough remains in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, in the library of Christ Church, Oxford, and elsewhere, to enable us to estimate the genius of Carissimi at its correct value. It will be remembered that the oratorio, "Jonas," was revived by Mr. Henry Leslie some years ago, but the event created no interest outside a narrow circle of musicians. The present volume contains four Latin oratorios, namely, "Jephte," "Judicium Salomonis," "Jonas," and "Baltazar." These works are similar in structure, though differing somewhat in points of detail. The narrative is allotted to a solo voice in each, while the dramatis personæ speak by means of the remaining soloists and the chorus. The accompaniments are never in more than four parts, and in the "Jephte" consist of a simple unfigured bass or continuo. The choral portions are extremely simple in structure, though in "Jonas" a double choir is employed, at first antiphonally and afterwards in eight real parts. The solos are written in a kind of semi-rhythmical recitative, and it is here that the genius of Carissimi is most fully displayed. So far from being dry and monotonous, these recitatives are remarkable for their dramatic feeling and appropriateness to the text, as well as for the essentially modern character of the harmonic progressions. This yearning towards true expression was a novel feature in sixteenth century music, and herein Carissimi showed himself an Italian of the Italians, leaving behind mere scientific pedantry, and indicating the more noble mission and power of the art as a means of portraying the various shades of emotion. But it must not be inferred from these remarks that the choruses in these oratorios are deficient in beauty or force. As an instance of the breadth and dignity to which the composer could attain, mention may be made of the final chorus in "Jephte," "Plorate filii, Israel," which Handel has adopted as the basis of his "Hear, Jacob's God," in "Samson." The closing number of "Jonas," "Peccavimus, Domine," is also very massive in effect. It is surely not unreasonable to assume that either the Bach Choir or the Cambridge University Musical Society will at no distant date indulge musicians with a hearing of one of Carissimi's sacred works. Their simplicity and brevity are qualities which should plead strongly in their favour.

Of the claims of Arcangelo Corelli it would be a work of supererogation to speak at length. Violinists recognise in him one who materially advanced the importance and capabilities of their instrument, while musicians in general admire the elegance of his style and the mingled purity and dignity of his melody. The present volume contains four sets of twelve sonatas for strings, of which the original titles are as follows: "Sonate da Chiesa a tre, due Violini e Violone, o Arcileuto, col Basso per l'Organo, Opera Prima, in Roma 1683." "Sonate da Camera a tre, due Violini e Violone, o Cembalo, Opera Seconda, in Roma 1685." "Sonate da Chiesa a tre, due Violini e Violone, o Arcileuto, col Basso per l'Organo, Opera Terza, in Modena 1689." "Sonate da Camera a tre, due Violini e Violone, o Cembalo, Opera Quarta, in Bologna 1694." Each sonata, whether for church or chamber, consists of three or four movements. In the chamber works the old dance forms are used, but in the so-called church sonatas the movements are more freely developed, and the resources of counterpoint brought into play. On the whole, therefore, these last are more interesting, and the introduction of one or more of them, say at the Monday Popular Concerts, would be deemed by many a commendable departure from the ordinary groove. There remains another set of twelve sonatas for violin, 1700, and these, with the concerti grossi, 1712, will doubtless form the second volume of Herr Joachim's edition.

François Couperin was born in 1668, fifteen years later than Corelli, and died in 1733, twenty years after the Italian master. As Corelli devoted himself chiefly to the violin, so Couperin is to be held in remembrance for his contributions to the clavecin. The two composers may therefore stand side by side in the temple of fame. The influence of Couperin may be very distinctly traced in many of the dance movements which are to be found in the suites for clavichord of J. S. Bach, both as regards the rhythm and the embellishments. According to Fétis, however, his sobriquet "le grand" was given to him by reason of his superior skill as an organist; but he never published any compositions for the organ. There are four books of suites for clavecin, of which two are included in the volume before us. The first book contains five, and the second seven, suites or "ordres," as they are entitled by the composer. No drawing-room piano music of the present day ever received more fantastic or unmeaning titles than those given by Couperin to the several movements of these works. This throws some light on the taste of the Parisian public in the early part of the eighteenth century. At the end of this volume Herr Brahms has wisely afforded an explanation of the various ornaments or "agréments" with which the music of Couperin abounds. The gratitude of musicians is due to Dr. Chrysander for the publication of these "Memorials," and the progress of the series will be watched with interest.

Ode to the North-East Wind. Poetry by the Rev. Charles Kingsley. The Music composed for Chorus and Orchestra by Alice Mary Smith (Mrs. Meadows White).

Cantatas graceful and musicianlike, but with no claim beyond a passing mark of recognition, are so plentiful in the present day that it is quite refreshing to have a composition of this class brought before our notice so replete with true poetical feeling, and so artistically and appropriately treated throughout as to earn a name for its composer, even had this honour not been already gained by previous works. In this case, however, we have only to record that the well-known creative talent of an artist, whom we still delight to call Alice Mary Smith, has been displayed to more than usual advantage in the Cantata before us; for, although simply constructed, it cannot but win its way to a high position, both by the beauty of its themes and the perfection of its workmanship. The opening chorus, in E minor and major, effectively prepares the hearer for the character of the work, the "Wild North-Easter" being well represented in the commencement by the minor subject, and the charming phrase in the major forming a good contrast, to the words "Tired we are of summer." In the second chorus, which begins unaccompanied, we have a most striking change of key, and some figures in the accompaniment which are most fancifully woven in with the voice parts. The Hunting Chorus, No. 3, is a characteristic and highly attractive piece for male voices only. A version of this chorus for mixed voices is given in an Appendix, "to meet the requirements of Choirs," it is said; but as we believe that the "requirements" of the composer should be the primary consideration in the selection of music, we sincerely hope that this number will be sung, in any performance of the work, as it was originally written. No. 4, "Let the luscious south wind," is remarkable for an obstinate syncopated accompaniment, and some highly effective changes of key, the varying character of the themes colouring the words with a fidelity which shows that the text has been well studied by the composer throughout. In the final chorus, "But the black North-Easter," the key of E minor (which is appropriately used whenever the subject of the Ode is addressed) contrasts well with the preceding number, and ends the piece with excellent effect. We can well imagine that the instrumentation of this Cantata will be absolutely necessary to realise fully the intentions of the composer; but even with the pianoforte arrangement, private as well as public choirs will assuredly thank us for drawing their attention to a work which cannot fail to please professional as well as non-professional listeners.

The Diatonic and Chromatic Scales in various forms calculated to promote Technical Execution. Compiled for the use of Pianoforte Students, by Arthur O'Leary. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is difficult to say anything absolutely new upon the subject of the scales, but Mr. O'Leary has at least put the result of his practical experience into so clear and concise a form that we cordially commend his Preface to the attention of diligent and earnest pianoforte students. "With all its wondrous and beautiful anatomical structure," he truly says, "the human hand is not naturally formed for the pianoforte keyboard; but the inequality of the several fingers may be adjusted to a great extent, if not entirely, by a judicious course of mechanical training, that by ceaseless care may overcome natal deficiencies and institute a second nature." The many who believe that they can play without training the hand cannot be told the above truths too often; and if only those who acted upon these directions were to exhibit their acquirements before listeners, we should assuredly have better—even if we had fewer—pianists. The various forms of scale passages, both diatonic and chromatic, are given in this work, most carefully fingered throughout, the use of the third finger on the black keys in octave passages (especially in legato playing) being, we are glad to see, strongly recommended. One very important feature in Mr. O'Leary's arrangement of the scales deserves notice. He has coupled the tonic major with its tonic minor, and advises that they should be practised in pairs; "the ear," he says, "is by this means trained to distinguish and associate, to separate and identify, the two forms of one and the same key, and to escape the confusion, injurious to players as much as to composers, of the two keys with the same signature." After the opinions upon the subject so often advanced in this journal, it is needless to say how cordially we agree with these remarks; and we have only to express a hope that Mr. O'Leary's work may inaugurate a reform so long pleaded for by all who have the courage to battle with the many old-world notions which still impede the study of the art.

A Dictionary of Music and Musicians (A.D. 1450-1880.) By eminent writers, English and Foreign. With illustrations and woodcuts. Edited by George Grove, D.C.L. Part IX. [Macmillan and Co.]

We have only space to notice occasionally the progress of this interesting work, which has thoroughly fulfilled the high expectations of its worth raised by the list of contributors and the name of its conscientious and zealous editor. The part before us contains some able articles by able hands; but the interest undoubtedly centres in the masterly essay upon Mendelssohn by Mr. Grove (which was commenced in the last part), a paper reflecting the utmost credit upon the author, not only for the admirable manner in which he has accumulated a valuable mass of facts in connection with the composer's works, but for the assiduity with which he has collected opinions on his pianoforte-playing from the many eminent living musicians who have heard him, and also for numberless anecdotes relating to his artistic life, both in Germany and England, which have never before appeared in print. Another important feature in this article is the publication of the opening of the first movement of a Symphony which was found amongst the loose papers of Mendelssohn, belonging to his daughter, Mrs. Victor Benecke, and is printed by her permission. The MS. is in full score, and has been compressed for the occasion by Mr. Franklin Taylor, so as accurately to represent the original. There are also a few bars evidently intended for the commencement of the slow movement. We may also mention that the letter written by Mendelssohn as a testimonial for Sterndale Bennett, when he became a candidate for the musical professorship at Edinburgh, is here given; and as Mr. Grove tells us that it has never been before published "in any permanent form," many will peruse it for the first time. As the spontaneous tribute of a German to an English artist it is well worthy of preservation.

The Musical Directory, Annual, and Almanack for 1880. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

The issue of this Directory for the present year contains one very marked improvement. We have always found it difficult in former numbers to discover the address of any professor not living in the metropolis, unless we first knew in what town he resided. The names of country professors are, however, now arranged alphabetically, as well as under the headings of the towns, as before; so that there is one list for London, and another for the rest of Great Britain. We have lighted upon some wrong addresses and a notice upon the decease of Mr. James Howell, the contrabassist, quoted from this journal, is said to be from the Times, but on the whole the work is carefully edited and many former errors have been corrected. It would be good if professors themselves would help in the compilation of this Directory, for we know how the hands of an editor are fettered when addresses are not forwarded, or held back until the last moment. As this is, no doubt, the principal reason why the work appears so late as in the month of February, we trust that next year the causes for delay may be, at least partially, removed.

Reeves's Musical Directory for 1880. [W. Reeves.]

We called attention to the excellent manner in which this Directory is arranged on its first appearance last year, and as the same plan is pursued in the present issue, we have little to add to our former notice. It is clearly and legibly printed; but the objectionable method of mixing up some of the advertisements with the general matter of the work, which we before pointed out, has not been remedied. We may mention, too, as completeness and accuracy should be the leading features in a book of reference, that the addresses of professors so well known as Mr. W. H. Holmes, the pianist, Mr. J. T. Willy, the violinist, Mr. H. R. Cox, singing-master at the Royal Academy of Music, and some others, are omitted; and that the residence of a professor who has recently removed is printed correctly, whilst the address of his wife—also a professor—is given at the former house. There is so much to commend in this book that we should be glad to see it made as perfect as possible.

Homeward. Four-part Song. The Poetry by H. Macdowall. Composed by Henry Leslie. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This part-song the composer tells us was written by him expressly for the "Glasgow Select Choir," and the admirers of the refined and melodious specimens of unpretending choral music he has composed during his long public career will therefore be glad that he gave his London audience an opportunity of hearing it sung by the choir which he called into existence, and over which he has for so many years presided. The theme is simple in the extreme; but, although there is no attempt at a display contrapuntal erudition, some charming effects in the vocal writing lift the song into a prominence which at the concert of the composer's choir on the 12th ult. was so fully recognised as to elicit not only the warmest applause, but a demand for its repetition which could not be resisted. Amongst the many good points in the composition we may mention a phrase, in A minor, led off by the sopranos and answered by the other voices; and at the conclusion the chromatic progression to the words "One evening God shall lead thee home" is exceedingly effective and appropriate. Choral societies will no doubt gladly avail themselves of the earliest opportunity of introducing so interesting a novelty into their programme.

Sonata in A minor, for the Organ. By Francis Edward Gladstone. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

The construction of this work is in every way admirable, and worthy the name of Dr. Gladstone as a musical scholar. If fault there be, we think it is in the want of invention or individuality. In our opinion, the themes or subjects are scarcely sufficiently attractive or striking for leading features in such an important work. The Andante will perhaps be the most popular movement, and the smooth part-writing shows that Dr. Gladstone knows how effective his style of composition can be made on the instrument upon which he is so clever an executant. The finale begins with a brilliant and well-designed subject for the pedals alone, and after a short episode in the Schumannesque style, the movement proceeds in the ordinary form.

Four Part-Songs for Male Voices. The music by Conrad Herman. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These unambitious Part-Songs are melodious, and, although not striking in originality, sufficiently sympathetic with the words to find favour with amateur singers and amateur audiences. No. 1, to Burns's verses, commencing "Of a' the airts the wind can blow," has an appropriately placid theme, simply but carefully harmonised. No. 2, "Come, let me take thee," has several effective phrases, amongst which we may cite a good use of the dominant ninth, and a prolonged 6-4, on the words "That I may live to love her," both included within the last seven bars. No. 3, "Though cruel fate," is scarcely so much to our mind—a modulation from F sharp major to A major being somewhat abrupt—nor can we award more than faint praise to No. 4, "My heart's in the Highlands." All the songs are written for two tenors and two basses.

The Lass I left ashore. Nautical Song. Words by Lewis Novra. Music by Charles H Shepherd. [Augener and Co.]

There is so much character about this song, that we are induced to rescue it from a pile of compositions, with no character at all, in order to save vocalists that trouble of selection to which we are unfortunately doomed ourselves. The dragging melody with four crotchets in the bar is excellently contrasted with the pleasing theme in waltz time to which it leads, a good effect being gained by the waying backwards and forwards between tonic and dominant in the bass. The harmonies, too, without being forced, are written with musicianly skill throughout; and the composition in every respect does credit to an author who has already proved that, even in small works, he does not trifle with his art.

A Regret. Reverie for the Pianoforte. By Sydney T. Spalding. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is evident that one of the most difficult things for a young composer, next to getting a really attractive phrase, is to know what to do with it when he has got it. Mr. Spalding's piece is an example of this. He has certainly composed an elegant little theme, in 3-4 time, which he introduces gracefully, the accompaniment crossing it with much effect; but we cannot believe that the attempt to force it into C time is a successful one; and the change afterwards into 6-8 gives a somewhat patchy effect to a piece which, in spite of these drawbacks, shows some sign of good feeling both for melody and harmony. If an unfortunate G, instead of A, in the first arpeggio, on page 2, could be altered, it would save pain to musical ears; and we presume also that the A in the second arpeggio should be G.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The homage rendered during the last few weeks to the genius of Mozart, both at Vienna and at various operatic establishments of Germany, forms a conspicuous feature of interest in current musical events on the Continent. We have already alluded in our last number to the "cyclus" of Mozart's operas recently performed, in chronological order, at the Vienna Opera. These representations, which are spoken of as having been in every way worthy of a special occasion, were brought to a close on January 28 (the anniversary of the composer's birth), with a poetic epilogue written by Herr J. Weilen, the recitation of which was accompanied by appropriate tableaux illustrating various important incidents in the career of the master. On the same day a similar series of commemorative Mozart-performances came to a successful termination at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater; a number of other operatic institutions in Germany having likewise followed the example set by Vienna, amongst whom may be mentioned the theatres of Hamburg, Frankfurt, and Wiesbaden, where special efforts had been made in order to realise, as far as possible, the intentions of the composer. The opportunities thus afforded to continental audiences to testify to their undiminished appreciation, spite of modern reformatory efforts, of the lyrical stage-works of Mozart have been enthusiastically embraced everywhere. At the same time it would be contrary to the intentions of their promoters to regard these performances in the light of counter-demonstrations directed against the influence upon public taste exercised by the now historical Bayreuth Festspiele, which likewise consisted of an entire series of music-dramas. The latter may, however, very probably have suggested the present undertaking, and, indeed, we believe that the scheme of a national lyrical stage to be founded at Bayreuth, if ever it is to be carried out, contemplates historical representations of the works of classical composers similar to those just referred to. In sympathy with the general tendency in favour of a periodical special recognition of the genius of "her greatest son," the town of Salzburg proposes to commemorate annually, by a festive performance, the fact of the great musician having been born there, the music festivals given in 1877 and 1879 by the Mozart Institution having scarcely been of a sufficiently representative character. Before quitting this subject, we may add that active support is being rendered by the German musical press to the plea advanced in our December number in favour of the preservation of "Mozart's Summer-house," forming part of the treasures of the Salzburg Institution, but exposed to the decaying effects of nature for want of a protective covering.

Wagner's seldom-heard music-drama "Tristan und Isolde" is in course of preparation at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, and will, it is stated, be performed there in June next. Herr and Frau Vogl, the eminent Munich artists, have been secured for the principal characters. This difficult work of the poet-composer was, it may be remembered, most successfully produced in 1874 and the following year at Weimar, with the same artists as the representatives of the hero and heroine.

At one of the recent Châtelet Concerts at Paris, Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser" was performed for the first time, without provoking the noisy demonstrations of dissent to which the production of the music of the reformer invariably gives the signal at the Concerts Populaires. The Revue et Gazette Musicale, however, explains the phenomenon by the fact of the obnoxious composition having been placed at the very end of the programme.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik contains an eulogistic article on the artistic activity displayed by Capellmeister Mannsfeld of Dresden, and his well-known orchestra, special reference being made to the recent excellent performance by that artistic body of Liszt's remarkable and as yet little-known "Faust Symphony."

Herr Adalbert Goldschmidt, whose remarkable oratorio, "The Seven Cardinal Sins," has now been produced at various musical centres of Germany, is at present engaged upon the composition of an opera entitled "Helianthus." During his recent stay at Berlin the young composer communicated the text-book, of which he is himself the author, to a private circle, when it excited the admiration of all present.

The eminent firm of pianoforte-makers, Julius Blüthner, of Leipzig, have just celebrated the completion of "No. 15,000" of their instruments, by a feast given to their employés. The factory was founded in 1853, with only three working hands, while it occupies now a foremost position in this branch of manufacture on the Continent.

The répertoire of the Paris Grand-Opéra has been limited to a few well-known operatic works, such as "La Muette," "Faust," "Les Huguenots," "Don Giovanni," and "La Juive." In the latter work Mdlle. Jenny Howe has made a successful début. A new opera in five acts, by Hypolite Duprat, brought out by the Opéra Populaire, and entitled "Pétrarque," is considered a very mediocre production by competent critics, but maintains itself on the répertoire of that institution, probably on account of its elaborate mise-en-scène.

Adelina Patti is just now fulfilling an engagement at the Gaîté Theatre, at Paris, in company with an Italian troupe under the direction of Signor Merelli. L'Art Musical mentions the fact that her two first representations, at the theatre referred to, of "Traviata" have produced the sum of 60,000 francs. The diva was to have appeared next in Rossini's "Il Barbiere."

Verdi has arrived in Paris, where the preparations for the mounting of his "Aïda" are being actively pursued at the Grand-Opéra, with a view to its production early in the present month.

A curious action has lately been decided by the Paris Tribunal de Commerce in favour of M. Vaucorbeil, the director of the Grand-Opéra, the plaintiff in the case being a M. de Grandsagne, a gentleman connected with the management of a provincial theatre. The latter, it appears, had caused a number of the artists engaged at his establishment to undertake a journey to the capital, at his expense, in order to show them, by paying a visit to the Opéra, "the manner in which a chef-d'œuvre should be performed." M. Grandsagne finding that in the performance of "La Favorita" an air and the divertissement had been "cut," thereupon claimed damages from the director, together with his right to a hearing of the uncurtailed work, under penalty of an additional indemnity of 1600 francs. The Tribunal accepted unhesitatingly M. Vaucorbeil's plea of justification.

M. Colonne, the director of the Châtelet Concerts and President of the Association Artistique, has been nominated by the Fine Arts Minister a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

A memorial in honour of F. Chopin has recently been erected at the Church of the Holy Cross at Warsaw. It consists of the bust of the composer, wrought in white marble, underneath which is a tablet bearing the inscription: "To the memory of Frederik Chopin, by his countrymen," followed by the dates of his birth and decease.

The occasion of the twentieth anniversary of the existence of a German Opera at Rotterdam was celebrated, on January 30, with a festive Cantata written by Dr. Pabst, and a performance of Gluck's "Orpheus."

A youthful prodigy has recently astonished the audience at a concert of the Association Artistique of Liége, by the performance of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, and the subsequent rendering, on the violin, of a "Faust-Fantasia" by Alard. The performer was a girl of nine years, Julia Folville, the daughter of an advocate residing in that town.

Henri Wieniawski, the eminent violin-virtuoso, has been seriously ill, but is said to be now in a fair way of recovery.

An opera by Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled "La Nuit de Mai," has met with popular success at St. Petersburg, and is considered an important addition to the répertoire of the new Russian school.

The death is announced, at Nice, of Jacques Herz, like his more generally known brother Henri an able pianist and composer of numerous pianoforte pieces. For the greater part of his life Jacques Herz was a resident of the French capital, where he also acquired a great reputation as a teacher of his instrument. He was born at Frankfurt on December 31, 1794.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (February 1): Symphony, C major (Mozart); Overture, "Melusine" (Mendelssohn); "Sadko," légende Russe (Rimsky-Korsakoff); Pianoforte Concerto, E flat (Beethoven); Overture, "Carnaval Romain" (Berlioz). Châtelet Concert (February 1): Overture, "Francs-Juges" (Berlioz); Symphony, A minor (Saint-Saëns); "Hymne à Sainte Cécile" (Gounod); "Les Erinnyes" (Massenet); Fragments from "Sylvia" (Délibes); Overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner). Concert du Conservatoire (February 8): "Roméo et Juliette," dramatic symphony (Berlioz); Fragments from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Chorus from "St. Paul" (Mendelssohn); Symphony in G, No. 31 (Haydn). Concert Populaire (February 8): Reformation Symphony (Mendelssohn); Concertstück (Weber); "Scènes Napolitaines," orchestral suite (Massenet); "Abendlied," orchestrated by Saint-Saëns (Schumann); Theme with Variations (Rameau); Gavotte (Niemann); Etude (Chopin); Overture "Rienzi" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (February 8): Symphony in A (Beethoven); "La Nuit de Walpurgis" (Widor); Concerto for Three Pianofortes (Bach); "Scènes Napolitaines" (Massenet); Fragments from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). Concert Populaire (February 15): Symphonie Fantastique (Berlioz); Violin Concerto, No. 2 (Saint-Saëns); Theme with Variations, from Serenade Trio, executed by all the first violins, violas, and violoncellos of the orchestra (Beethoven); "Atala," lyric poem (C. de Grandval); Overture, "Semiramide" (Rossini). Châtelet Concert (February 15): Symphony, D minor (Schumann); Violin Concerto (Mendelssohn); Overture, "Vénitien" (A. Caken); Pianoforte Concerto, G minor (Saint-Saëns); Fragments from "Roméo et Juliette" (Berlioz).

Cologne.—Gürzenich Concert (January 13): Overture, "Athalie" (Mendelssohn); Air, "Alexander's Feast" (Handel); Deutsches Requiem (Brahms); Symphony, No. 2 (Brahms). Gürzenich Concert (January 27), Commemoration of Mozart's Birthday: Overture, "Zauberflöte;" Pianoforte Concerto, D minor; Masonic Dirge; Ave verum; Sonata for two pianofortes; Symphony, C major; Airs from "Don Giovanni" and "Così fan tutte" (Mozart); pianists, Madame Schumann and Herr Kwast.

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (January 22): Symphony No. 8 (Beethoven); Bacchanal from Ballet, "Achille à Scyros" (Cherubini); Overture, "Dame Kobold" (Reinecke); Schicksalslied (Brahms); Variations on "God save the King," by all the strings of the orchestra (Haydn); Fragments from "The Ruins of Athens" (Beethoven). Gewandhaus Concert (January 29): Overture, "Zauberflöte" (Mozart); Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2 (Reinecke); Larghetto from Coronation Concert and Alla Turca, for pianoforte (Mozart); Symphony, in G minor (Mozart). Gewandhaus Concert (February 5): Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Violin Concerto (Vieuxtemps); "Le Trille du Diable" (Tartini); Symphony, in A minor (Mendelssohn); vocal soli. Concert of the University Sänger-Verein (February 3): Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" (Mendelssohn); "Rinaldo," Cantata (Brahms); "Media Vita," Battle-song of the monks, from Scheffel's "Ekkehard," for six-part male chorus (Bruch); Songs for male chorus (Rheinberger, Kremser, Lindner, Reinecke, Schumann, &c.

Dresden.—Concert of the Sinfonie-Capelle (January 23): Overture, "Paris et Helena" (Gluck); Symphony, B flat major (Gade); Siegfried-Idyll (Wagner); Symphony, D major (Beethoven). Concert of the Tonkünstler-Verein (January 26): Serenade, D minor (Dvorák); Sonata for pianoforte and violin, F major (Grieg); Concerto for two altos, two violas da gamba, violoncello, and bass (J. S. Bach). Concert of the Sinfonie-Capelle (February 11): Overture, "Leonore," No. 2 (Beethoven); Rhapsody, for alto solo, male chorus, and orchestra (Brahms); Violin Concerto (Goldmark); Selections from "Götterdämmerung;" Introduction, Rhinedaughters' Song, and Siegfried's Death (Wagner).

Breslau.—Concert of the Orchester-Verein (February 3): Overture "Coriolanus" (Beethoven); Pianoforte Concerto, E flat major (Liszt); Serenade for stringed orchestra, Op. 9 (Fuchs); Pianoforte Pieces (Chopin, Saint-Saëns, Buths); Symphony, No. 3 (Gade). Chamber Concert of the Orchester-Verein (February 12): Sonata, B flat major, for two violins and continuo (Handel); Quartet, F major (B. Scholz); Trio, D major, Op. 70 (Beethoven). Concert of the Orchester-Verein (February 17): Masonic Dirge (Mozart); Air from "Idomeneo" (Mozart); Nos. 9 and 16 from Ballet, "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Songs (Brahms, Schubert, and Weber); Symphony in C (Schubert).

Auburn (N.Y.).—Organ Recitals of J. V. Flagler (January 24, 31, and February 7): Toccata and Fugue, D minor; Prelude and Fugue, C minor; Fugue, E flat (Bach); Overtures to "Egmont," "Maritana," and "Alessandro Stradella" (Beethoven, Wallace, Flotow); Entr'acte from "Rosamunde" (Schubert); Sonata in G (Flagler); &c.

Baltimore.—Concert of the Peabody Institute (January 31): Ocean Symphony (Rubinstein); Andante and Rondo from Violin Concerto (Mendelssohn); Hungarian Rhapsodie (Liszt); Overture, "Raid of the Vikings" (E. Hartmann). Students' Concert of the same (January 24): Trio, C major, Op. 87 (Beethoven); Love Song from Norse Suite, Op. 25 (Hamerik); Twelve two-part songs (Mendelssohn); Variations Sérieuses for Pianoforte (Mendelssohn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. DAY'S THEORY OF HARMONY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I shall be glad if Mr. Lecky's article on Dr. Day's system at last arouses some champion to enter into a friendly argument in its defence. Mr. Lecky refers to my lecture on the subject, read at a meeting of the Musical Association, and I beg now to supplement his further arks by pointing out that, by selecting the tonic, the ertonic, and the dominant, as roots in the key, and ding thereon chords, by the superposition of thirds up the extreme limit of the interval of the thirteenth n the root, the Day theory complacently adopts nds of different pitch as identical. It thus furnishes less than three different pitches for the key-note itself*—tartling, and, to me, utterly condemnatory anomaly the very outset. But, further, it also provides (in the or mode) three different pitches for the mediant; two† the subdominant (neither of which is the true one); for the dominant (though one of these is disallowed ractice); two for the submediant (neither of which orrect); and two for the leading-note. The solitary e for which it gives an unvarying pitch is the super-c. Adopting the standard of 264 vibrations for tenor he following table shows the above varying pitches rding to the Day derivations, together with what I eive to be the correct pitch in each case, in the of C major:—

Number of Vibrations, according to Dr. Day's Derivations.
Tonic Root.	Supertonic Root.	Dominant Root.	True Pitch.
264	259$\frac{7}{8}$	272$\frac{1}{4}$ (a)	264
297	297	297	297
330	334$\frac{1}{8}$	321$\frac{3}{4}$	330
363 (b)	...	346$\frac{1}{2}$	352
396	408$\frac{3}{8}$ (c)	396	396
429	445$\frac{1}{8}$	445$\frac{1}{8}$	440
...	482$\frac{5}{8}$	495	495

(a) Or 259$\frac{7}{8}$
(b) Or 346$\frac{1}{2}$
(c) Or 389$\frac{1}{16}$
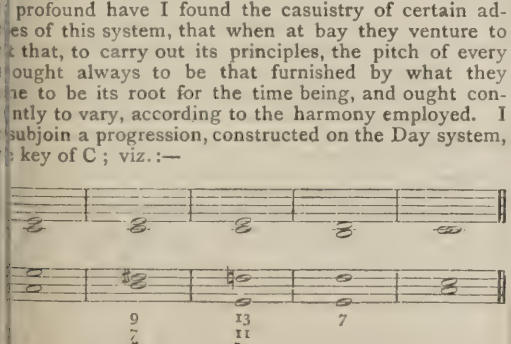
} if we go as high as the twentieth harmonic.

will be seen from the above that Dr. Day's derivations y the correct ratios for the triads on the key-note and ominant. But, according to his system, the super- diatonic triad is part of the chord of the ninth on the nant; the triad on the mediant, though disallowed, is able as part of the chord of the thirteenth on the super- ; the subdominant triad—in reality one of the governing rs in the key—is actually deduced from the chord of leventh on the dominant, which gives every one of the of the subdominant triad in an incorrect pitch; and ubmediant triad is part of the chord of the ninth on upertonic. In not one solitary instance in these do these derivations supply either a true major or r third, or a perfect fifth; and in the remaining triad, ly, that on the leading-note, the system gives us a ished fifth vibrating in the proportion of 63, instead to 45.

profound have I found the casuistry of certain ad- es of this system, that when at bay they venture to t that, to carry out its principles, the pitch of every ought always to be that furnished by what they e to be its root for the time being, and ought con- ntly to vary, according to the harmony employed. I subjoin a progression, constructed on the Day system, key of C; viz.:—



now indicate, in the case of the two upper notes

ced to two ced to one
} if we go as unreasonably high as the twentieth harmonic on the } dominant tonic.

which here appear in the first three harmonies, the variations of pitch in accordance with the above doctrine, viz.:—

E.	660	668$\frac{1}{4}$	643$\frac{1}{2}$
C.	528	519$\frac{3}{4}$	544$\frac{1}{2}$ (a)
Roots.	C.	D.	G.

(a) or 519$\frac{3}{4}$, if we go as high as the twentieth harmonic.

The true major third is here shown in the first column of figures; in the next column we see its expansion for the supertonic harmony; and lastly, in the third column, its terrific collapse for that on the dominant. The differences in the relative numbers of the vibrations of the two notes in question are 132, 148$\frac{1}{2}$, and 99 (or 123$\frac{3}{4}$). I do not think that anyone will require auricular test of these differences. The figures alone are quite conclusive.

It is possibly my misfortune that I differ, as I distinctly do, from high authority in favour of Day's theory, but I cannot set aside conscientious convictions, and I have at least the solace of good company. My views were largely set forth in the lecture to which allusion has already been made, and nothing has arisen to shake my conviction that the system is an empirical outcome of the endeavours of an enthusiast, earnest indeed, but starting on a false foundation, and, when difficulties and anomalies arose, lacking courage to discard that foundation, preferring to make everything bend to it, and complacently adopting results for whatever it was convenient to call them. It is indeed marvellous that the serenity of the advocates of this system should not be disturbed even by the damning facts which I sum up in conclusion, namely, that to the key-note itself and to the mediant also it gives three different pitches; and, to four of the five other notes of the scale, two pitches, both of which, in the case of two such notes, are untrue.—Faithfully yours,

Charles E. Stephens.

Sir,—In reply to your correspondent's inquiry whether the "Elijah" was composed to German or English words, I beg to state that in a letter to my late husband, dated Leipzig, May 11, 1846, Mendelssohn says, "I asked Mr. Moore, from Birmingham, to have it ('Elijah') translated by you, and I have no doubt but he will communicate with you about it." After other remarks, the composer adds, "And pray give it your best English words, for till now I feel so much more interest in this work than for my others, and I only wish it may last so with me."

The Oratorio was sent in portions for the translations, and returned in like manner for the composer's approval. When "O rest in the Lord" arrived, Mr. Bartholomew saw a great resemblance in the opening bar to "Auld Robin Gray;" thinking that Mendelssohn might like to be informed of it, Mr. Bartholomew sent him the song, and asked if it would not be prudent to alter the Aria; the composer answered, "Many thanks for your last letter, with the remark about the song. I do not recollect having heard the ballad to which you allude, and certainly did not think of it, and did not choose to imitate it; but as mine is a song to which I always had an objection (of another kind), and the ballad seems much known, and the likeness very striking, and before all, as you wish it, I shall leave it out altogether (I think), and have altered the two last bars of the preceding Recitative, so that the Chorus in F may follow it immediately."

Mr. Bartholomew replied by return of post to say that the only similarity was in the first bar, and begged that it might be altered, and the song retained, as it was likely to prove a great favourite. Fortunately, his suggestion was adopted.—Your obedient servant,

Ann S. Mounsey Bartholomew.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In an article on the English version of "Elijah" there is at least one error, which I am glad to be able to correct. Dr. Gauntlett was not the organist at Birmingham in 1846, though he shared with me the duties of organist at the Festival; nor did he play the organ part in "Elijah" from the full score, but from a MS. organ part. Whether Mendelssohn wrote the music to German words without any consideration as to the English libretto is questionable, seeing that the Oratorio was expressly written for our Festival; it is quite possible the full score may contain the German words only, and yet the English adaptation may have been in the mind of the composer.

One thing I can vouch for, that Mendelssohn was most particular with respect to the English libretto, for some portions of the vocal score sent to me from time to time, as the work progressed, were written in no less than three different forms, one after another being erased or written over, so that it was no easy matter to decipher the author's intention; but from recollection, I may say, I believe the arrangement of the words now in use differs very slightly, if at all, from those used at the first performance.

As I had the training of the chorus for the Festival in question, 1846, and turned over the leaves for Dr. Gauntlett, your correspondent, "J. E. A. T.," may be assured I know something of the subject in which he is so much interested.—Yours truly,

James Stimpson,
Organist of the Town Hall,
Birmingham, since 1842.

MOZART'S "TWELFTH MASS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—As a defender of Mozart in regard to the authorship of what is termed his "Mass No. 12," I was glad to see the letter signed "Fosco" in last month's issue, and trust it will lead to some competent person giving the subject a thorough investigation. Mr. Cummings, by his able papers on the subject of "God save the King," has shown his capability for such a task, and many readers would gladly hail a series of articles on the matter from his pen, or from that of Dr. Pole, Carl Engel, &c. Mr. Ebenezer Prout seems to think that from internal evidence the Mass is spurious. This opinion, coming from one who is so thoroughly conversant with all musical matters, must have considerable weight; but yet I question whether internal evidence will not help to establish the authenticity of the work. But first, the question naturally occurs—If Zellner wrote the Mass, how is it that we have no other relic of such a genius? for surely a master-hand is visible in almost every page of it. Was this his first and last composition, or did this genius, by some whim of Dame Fortune, die almost unknown, leaving posterity a triumph of musical skill?

However, let us take a cursory glance at Novello's octavo edition of Mozart's "Twelfth Mass."

The Kyrie opens in 3-4 time, and some bars are strangely suggestive of like measures in "Sull aria" ("Figaro"). The Gloria dashes off in common time, and we find six bars at the words "bonæ voluntatis" that at once recall a portion of the overture to "Figaro," whilst the "Domine Deus" is almost similar to the music assigned to the words "Pugnanti est cuta opitulante te opis," from Mozart's "Splendente te Deus." The "Quoniam" is not unlike the opening bars of the duetto "Pa-pa-pa" ("Flauto Magico"), whilst the tenor solo "Et incarnatus est," in the Credo, brings us back to "Quel suono ohime" from "Flauto Magico," and the "Et vitam," as well as the "Dominus Deus Sabaoth" of the Sanctus, are quite in the style of Mozart. The "Pleni sunt coeli," "Benedictus," and "Dona nobis" are thoroughly characteristic; and with these random excerpts I will conclude, hoping that some more qualified person will throw some light on the subject.

I am, yours, &c.,
February, 1880. William H. Flood.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—To prevent mistake I will begin by stating that I am a graduate in music by examination at the University of Cambridge. Reading between the lines of the letter in the February number of "The Musical Times" signed "A Mus. Bac. of the Future," and reasoning in the same manner as he does as to that on the above subject signed by "Mus. Bac." in the January number, I conclude t either "A Mus. Bac. of the Future" must be a dis pointed candidate for that degree at the University Dublin, or else unaware that the other Universities he m tions (those of Heidelberg and New York) do not gr degrees in music by examination, and indeed, so far one can ascertain, have no power to grant any degrees music.

It would be absurd of Cambridge men to sneer at Irish Universities (from whence, by the way, we have ceived our Senior Wranglers for 1879 and 1880), and l bably none of us would be guilty of such nonsense. the same time, as your paper has an enormous circula all over the civilised world, a letter like that of "A M Bac. of the Future" should not go unchallenged, les should be erroneously supposed to come from

THE WAGNER CONTROVERSY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I notice in the current number of your valu journal a paragraph drawing attention to the "exube verbosity" displayed by L'Art Musical of Paris when reference is made in that periodical to the name of Bayreuth reformer, and suggesting that a volume m with advantage be compiled combining, in this conven form, all the abuse which has been flung at the poet-c poser during his artistic career. Allow me to state this has actually been done by W. Tappert, the wo editor of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung of Be who, in the year 1877, published a volume enti "Wagner Lexicon: a vocabulary of incivility, contai coarse, sneering, invidious, and slandering expres used in connection with the master Richard Wagner works and his adherents, by his enemies and deri collected as an amusing pastime in leisure hours." book in question, besides furnishing an interesting co bution to the curiosities of modern literature, has merit of proving beyond doubt the fact of its hero b one of the best-abused men of our time.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NE

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expres this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Abingdon.—On the 5th ult. the Musical Association gave a tion from Mendelssohn's Elijah. The choruses were well sus by the choir, and the solos were ably rendered by local talent, wi exception of the part of the Prophet, which was taken by Mr. well, of Oxford. The solos were allotted to Mr. Kendall, Mrs. Miss Rant, and Mr. Lewis. The Accompanists were Mrs. Baker Harding, and Mr. H. R. Couldrey (harmonium). Mr. Fre Couldrey conducted.

Alnwick.—A fine performance of Handel's Messiah was given in e Corn Exchange on Thursday evening, January 29, by the members the Alnwick Choral Union (assisted, as regards the tenor and bass los, by Messrs. Whitehead and Grice, of Durham Cathedral). The ioir numbered not far short of 180 voices; there was a good amateur rchestral band; Mr. Charles E. Moore conducted; and Mr. A. J. osden presided at the American organ with his well-known ability. he soprano and alto solos were taken by Mrs. Perry, Miss Cockburn, liss Purvis, and Miss A. Thompson. The choruses went exceedingly ell, especially "For unto us a Child is born." The band played the verture, the "Pastoral Symphony," and the various accompaniments a highly commendable manner.

Andover.—A very successful performance of Judas Maccabæus was ven by the members of the Musical Society in the Town Hall on hursday, the 5th ult., to a large and appreciative audience. The ioruses throughout were well and steadily sung, especially "Hear us, Lord," and "We never will bow down." The solos were taken by lisses Faithful and Holmes, and Messrs. Blandford, Wells, and lacklin. Mr. J. W. Chuter conducted. Mr. G. W. Baker presided at e piano, Mr. W. Harvey at the harmonium, and by their efficient ccompaniments contributed greatly to the success of the Concert.

Banbury.—The Bodicote Glee Club, assisted by Mdlle. Antelli Oxford), Messrs. Allen, Edmunds, Hallewell, and Guggenheim, gave a oncert in the village School-room, on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., a large and appreciative audience. Mdlle. Antelli rendered valuable rvice, her singing of "At the Ferry" (Wellings) gaining a well-erited encore. Mr. Guggenheim's violin solos were well executed, d had to be repeated. The Concert was a thorough success, and the rt singing reflected great credit on Mr. T. A. Aldridge, the Con-ctor of the Society.

Belfast.—The second Subscription Concert for the season of the elfast Choir was given in the Music Hall on the 3rd ult. A most ccessful performance of Mozart's Requiem occupied the first part; e second part being a miscellaneous vocal and instrumental selection. he performance of the Requiem (the first in Belfast with orchestra) as noticeable for the precision and finish with which the most difficult mbers were sung. The quartets were taken by members of the ciety, a feature of the "Tuba mirum" being the fine playing of the mbone obbligato by Mr. Hall. The second part of the programme cluded the Andante and Rondo from a Trio by Hummel, for piano, olin, and violoncello, brilliantly played by Mr. J. S. Firth, the pianist the Society, Mr. H. Cohen, and Herr Elsner; a violin solo, "Cradle ng," composed and played by H. Cohen; Concerto in A minor (Got-mann), by Herr Elsner; Boccherini's Minuet in A for muted ings; Randegger's "Peacefully slumber," with violoncello obbli-o; a song from Paisiello's Barber of Seville; and a male chorus from umann's Cantata, The Pilgrimage of the Rose. Mr. F. C. Smythe, s. Bac., acted most efficiently in his accustomed post of Conductor. etz's Psalm, By the Waters of Babylon, Beethoven's "Meeresstille," l a Sanctus in D by Bach, will be performed at the next Concert.—— e third Subscription Concert of the season was given in the Ulster ll on the 10th ult., by the members of the Philharmonic Society. e programme commenced with Handel's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, lowed by a miscellaneous selection. All the items were well ren-ed. The most enjoyable item in the first part was Weber's "Con-rtstück," played to perfection by Mr. B. H. Carroll, and accompanied he orchestra; Wesley's Motett "In Exitu Israel," concluded the t part. In the singing of this fine composition the chorus showed care that had been bestowed on the rehearsal. Herr Borges ed a violin solo by David with much effect, and the Concert was ught to a close by Sir H. R. Bishop's Quintet "Now by day's ring lamp." Sir Robert P. Stewart conducted with his usual ciency.——The second Concert of the season in connection with Choral Society was given in the Ulster Hall on the 20th ult. The gramme was miscellaneous, and consisted of selections from ndard operas, with instrumental and choral items. The soloists e Madame Sinico-Campobello, Miss Ward, Signor Urio, and nor Campobello; Mdlle. Douste (piano), and Mdlle. Galatzin loncello). There were several concerted pieces, which were well ived; and the Choir was very successful in the part-songs. Signor nerana was the accompanist, and Mr. W. J. Kempton conducted.

Berkhampstead.—A Harmonic Society has been established here onnection with the Grammar School. J. E. Legg, Esq., B.A., has n his valuable advice and assistance, and it is hoped that in future e good Concerts will be given every year.

Birmingham.—The third of Mr. Stratton's Popular Chamber Con-s was given in the Masonic Hall on the 3rd ult., with the following gramme: Quartet in E minor (Op. 44, No. 2), Mendelssohn; Sonata 5.) in B flat, for pianoforte and clarionet, Dr. C. S. Heap; Suite . 31), pianoforte, Bargiel; Quintet in B flat (Op. 34), clarionet and gs, Weber. With the exception of the first, all these pieces were formed for the first time in Birmingham, Dr. Heap's Sonata having n composed expressly for the Concert. This work is a fine com-ition, consisting of three movements, the themes and their treat-t being most musicianly. The artists were Messrs. Abbott, he, Ward, and Owen, strings; Mr. T. E. Pountney, clarionet, and Heap, pianoforte. There was a larger audience than at any pre-s Concert of the kind; the whole programme was excellently lered, and Dr. Heap received an enthusiastic recall after the per-nance of his Sonata.——The Festival Choral Society's second cert took place in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 12th ult. The gramme comprised Mozart's Requiem Mass, and Barnett's Cantata, adise and the Peri. The vocal principals were Miss Anna Williams, ame Enriquez, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Thurley Beale. There a large and efficient band; Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ, Mr. Stockley conducted in his usual able manner. Both works e well rendered and highly appreciated by a large audience.—— Saturday Evening Popular Concerts, in the Town Hall, continue rove most attractive, and to draw crowded audiences. At the cert on the 7th ult., Mrs. Bunting Fowler, and Messrs. Bickley, odhall, Stilliard, and Campion, Members of the Birmingham Glee on, were the vocalists. Mr. D. Ffrench Davis contributed harp s, which were highly appreciated, and the organ solos by Mr. mpson were also a great attraction. The encores were numerous. Mr. W. G. Halliley was the accompanist.——On the 14th ult., the programme consisted of Gounod's Mass in G, and a selection of part-songs rendered by the members of Mr. Rowland M. Winn's Choir. Conductor, Mr. Winn; Mr. Robinson, accompanist, and Mr. Stimpson, organist.——On the 21st ult., the Edgbaston Glee Union was engaged (Messrs. Lowe, Young, Breeze, and Horrex), with Mrs. Youens as soprano; Mr. T. E. Pountney, solo clarionet; Miss Winifred Robinson, solo violin, and Mr. W. Halliley, Conductor. An excellent programme was provided, and all acquitted themselves well. Miss Robinson, a youthful pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, played with wonderful taste and ability, and created a marked impression. There was, as usual, an immense audience.

Bristol.—On Monday, the 2nd ult., Miss Farler gave her Annual Concert in the Colston Hall, assisted (by special arrangement with Mr. Mapleson, the Director of Her Majesty's Opera) by the following eminent artists: Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Darialli, Madame Marie Roze, Signor Tecchi, Signor Susini, and Mr. Carleton. The programme consisted chiefly of the most popular operatic solos, with several English songs and ballads. Mdlle. Sacconi contributed a couple of harp solos, and Professor Hill conducted.——On Thursday, the 5th ult., the annual Ladies' Night of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society was given in the Colston Hall. The Society's choir rendered an excellent selection of music in a most charming manner, Mr. George Riseley conducting. The programme included Cooke's "Strike the lyre" and "Hohenlinden;" Horsley's "Cold is Cadwallo's tongue;" Weelkes' "The Nightingale;" Storeli's "Serenade" (encored); "An Italian salad," by R. Genée (also redemanded); Hargreaves' "Hours of beauty;" "The dying child," by I. I. Viotta; Hatton's "When evening's twilight;" Becker's "On the march;" Reissiger's "When the lines of daylight fade;" and other equally well-known pieces.—— The choir of St. Peter's Church gave its Annual Concert in the Lesser Colston Hall, on Tuesday, the 10th ult. The first part consisted of the Ruins of Athens (Beethoven), and the second part of Sullivan and Gilbert's Trial by Jury (by permission). The soloists were Madame Brettelle, Miss Brain, Mr. Kidner, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Brain, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. Thomas. The accompaniments were played by Dr. Colman. The Rev. G. T. Harding read the dialogue in the Ruins of Athens, and Mr. Alfred Brookes, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Peter's, conducted.

Canterbury.—The members of the Amateur Choral Union, assisted by an efficient band, gave their first Concert of the season on January 29, in the Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. S. Walker, the Conductor. The performance consisted of Bennett's May Queen, and a new comic Cantata, The Jackdaw of Rheims, by George Fox. The principal artists were Miss Nelly McEwen (who met with an enthusiastic reception), Miss H. Muirhead, Mr. John F. Probert, and Mr. J. Higgins, of the Cathedral choir. There was a large audience.

Clifton.—On Wednesday, the 4th ult., Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy gave the third of her series of Chamber Concerts for the present season, in the Victoria Rooms. Mr. Henry Holmes took the first violin, Mr. Valentine Nicholson the second violin, Mr. Alfred Burnett the viola, Mr. J. Pomeroy the violoncello, and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy presided at the pianoforte. Miss Kate Shackell, R.A.M., was the vocalist. There was, as usual, a good attendance.

Dawley, Salop.—On Tuesday evening, January 27, the members of the Choral Society, recently formed, gave their first Concert with a chorus of sixty voices, in the Town Hall. There was a good attendance. The programme included part-songs, &c., by Hatton, Pinsuti, Garrett, Bishop, Sullivan, Buck, and Locke's Macbeth music, &c. The first and last movements of Walter Macfarren's First Sonata for Piano and Violin were played by Miss Ellis and Mr. Smart (of Newport), who conducted the Concert.

Denbigh.—The Concert given in the Town Hall on Friday night, the 6th ult., by the Philharmonic Society, fully sustained the reputation both of the Society and its excellent Conductor, Mr. F. C. Watkins. The work performed was Haydn's Oratorio, The Creation, and the artists engaged were Mrs. Sutton, Mr. J. M. Powell, and Mr. S. Brandon; leader of the orchestra, Mr. C. A. Stephenson; piano, Mr. John Jones, Organist of St. Mary's Church; harmonium, Major T. Casson. The rendering of the work was highly satisfactory.

Dover.—The eighth Concert of the Dover Catch Club was given on Thursday, the 12th ult., under the direction of the Hon. Secretary, W. Gorton, Esq., when a highly interesting and well-arranged programme was admirably rendered. The artists engaged were Miss Laura Grey, Miss Blanche Grosvenor, Mr. Alfred Moir, Mr. Lovett King, and Mr. Prenton. The hall was well filled by a most appreciative audience. E. P. Robinson, Esq., presided.

East Grinstead.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Vocal and Instrumental Concert of the season on Thursday, the 19th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Moore, the Misses Braham, and Mr. Seymour Kelly, Vicar Choral of Chichester Cathedral; pianists, Miss E. C. E. Philpott and Miss Badcock. The first part of the programme consisted of Locke's Macbeth music, in which Mr. Kelly's fine voice told with marked effect. The gem of the second part was Bishop's "Now tramp," Miss Moore taking the solo in capital style. Mr. W. A. Philpott ably conducted.

Edinburgh. — Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital on Saturday afternoon, the 7th ult., preliminary to the Reid and other Concerts, the music being selected from the programmes to be performed on these occasions. The class-room was extremely crowded. Sir Herbert's fine setting of Geibel's Sehnsucht was warmly encored and partly repeated. A like honour was awarded to the excellent rendering of the Allegretto from Beethoven's No. 8 Symphony, but was not responded to. The customary mark of respect to the memory of the Founder of the Chair of Music was paid, by the audience standing during the playing of his well-known march.——The Nicolson Street Church Musical Association gave a performance of Handel's Jephtha in the Music Hall on the 10th ult., in presence of a crowded audience. The soloists were the Misses Blair, Outerson, Moir, and Macgregor; and Messrs. Verney Binns and Conochie. In the part of "Jephtha," Mr. Binns made a successful first appearance in Edinburgh, and was much applauded for his singing of the air, "Waft her, angels." The choruses were admirably rendered, "When His loud voice in thunder spoke," "How dark, O Lord, are Thy decrees," and "Theme sublime," being particularly noticeable for precision and expression. The orchestra was led by Mr. Daly. Mr. J. S. Anderson, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was an efficient Organist, and Mr. James B. Shaw conducted.

Erith.—Spohr's Last Judgment and Stainer's Daughter of Jairus were the works performed by the members of the Erith Choral Society at the last Concert of the season on the 9th ult. The choir did its work admirably, singing well together and taking up the respective leads with good attack. The solos were excellently sung by Master Dunster and Messrs. Kenningham and Kempton. Mr. Humphrey Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was the accompanist at the piano, and the harmonium (in the absence of Mr. Hodge), was very kindly undertaken by Mr. Kenningham. Mr. Richard Lemaire, as usual, conducted.

Glasgow.—The St. George's Choral Union gave the second of their series of Concerts on the 2nd ult., in the St. Andrew's Hall, before a large audience. The soloists were Madame Emma Beasley and Mr. Henry Seligmann, both of whom gave unbounded satisfaction. The choruses were well rendered. Mr. William Moodie conducted, Dr. Peace accompanying on the organ, and contributing two solos which were highly appreciated, Mr. John Turnbull rendering the piano accompaniments with exquisite taste.——A Concert was given by Herr Mahr in the St. Andrew's Lesser Hall on the evening of the 12th ult., the artists being Miss Helen Hopekirk (solo pianist), Herr Mahr (violinist), and Herr Galbrein (violoncelloist). The sudden indisposition of Herr Mahr was a matter of sincere regret, and the necessary change of programme prevented the Concert being one of the best of the season.——Mr. Charles Hallé and his ever-welcome Manchester Orchestra gave their Annual Concert in the St. Andrew's Hallon the 18th ult. The more important orchestral numbers were Spohr's "Power of Sound" and Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, both given with the precision for which Mr. Hallé's Orchestra is so celebrated. Madame Norman-Néruda performed in her usual artistic style several violin solos, and took part with Mr. Hallé in the Andante with variations from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata. There was a large and fashionable attendance.——The principal artists of the Royal Italian Opera, viz., Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, Mdlle. Darialli, Mdlle. Saccori (harpist), and Madame Marie Roze, Signor Leli (already an established Glasgow favourite), Signor Susini, Mr. Carleton, and Professor Hill, Pianist and Conductor, gave a special grand Concert in the City Hall on the 21st ult., before a densely-filled house. The harp solos of Mdlle. Sacconi were greatly admired, as was also the singing of Madame Marie Roze and Mdlle. Ilma di Murska. Signor Leli thoroughly roused the audience to a pitch of enthusiasm by his singing "Of a' the airts the wind can blaw."

Halifax.—On Thursday, January 29, another Organ Recital was given by Dr. Roberts, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, in the Stannary Congregational Church, which was crowded. The organ solos were interspersed with vocal music by Mrs. Whitehead, Miss Emily Empsall, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. J. Shepley. Over £40 was realised.

Halstead.—On the 5th ult., Mr. Walter Fitzgerald, B.A., Organist of Holy Trinity Church, gave a highly successful and well-attended Concert in the Town Hall. The vocalists were Miss Rose Barnby and the British Glee Union. Mdlle. Bertha Brousil contributed two violin solos, and was most rapturously recalled after each. Miss Barnby, Mr. Prenton, and Mr. James Brown (who took the place of Mr. Sidney Barnby), were especially effective and successful in their songs. The glees were well rendered and highly appreciated. Mr. Lovett King and Mr. Fitzgerald accompanied.

Hamilton, Canada.—On Tuesday, January 13, Mrs. Adamson and Mr. Aldous gave their third Concert. The programme comprised Mozart's Twelfth Sonata for Violin and Piano, Cavatina by Raff, "Margarita's three bouquets," by Braga; and Haydn's First Trio. Miss Callaghan played Chopin's Tarantelle, Op. 43, and the piano part in Mozart's Sonata; and Mr. Aldous contributed F. Hiller's Sarabande in A minor, and took the piano in the Haydn Trio. Miss Maggie Barr was the vocalist.

Hull.—The seventh Annual Concert in aid of the Widows and Orphans' Fund was given on the 2nd ult., in the Public Rooms, Jarratt Street, under distinguished patronage. The artists were Madame Tonnelier, Miss Damian, Mr. Charles Blagbro, Mr. Henry Cross, Miss Richardson, Mr. A. Hudson, Mr. Billington, Mr. Coverdale, Mr. J. S. Haydon; Mrs. W. T. Watson, Accompanist, and Mr. W. E. Walton, Conductor. The programme was miscellaneous, and the various items were well rendered.——The fifty-ninth Public Concert of the Harmonic Society was given on the 13th ult., in the Music Hall, Jarratt Street, when Handel's Oratorio Israel in Egypt was performed. The choruses were excellently rendered by the members of the Society, and the solos were given in a very efficient manner by the Misses Arthur and Rosse, and Messrs. Welch and McCall. Mr. J. W. Stephenson was Conductor, Mr. G. H. Smith Organist, and Mr. E. Winter leader of the band.

Lee.—The Burnt Ash Choral Society's first Concert was given very successfully in the Public Hall, on the 10th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Horton Corbett, Assoc. Mus., Trin. Coll., Lond. The programme included several part-songs and choruses, the most important being Handel's "Swell the full chorus" (Solomon), and Mendelssohn's "Thou didst free them" (Lauda Sion). The vocal and instrumental solos were performed by Miss A. E. Wallace and Messrs. Ravenor, Morley, Johnston, and Field; Miss Kate Field and Mr. Horton Corbett (pianoforte), and Mr. H. Kingsford (harmonium).

Levenshulme.—At St. Peter's Church, on Saturday, January 31, the new organ which has just been completed by Messrs. Jardine, of Manchester, was opened by Mr. W. J. Young, the Organist of the Church, a special service being held, and a sermon preached by the Rev. J. Davenport Kelly, rural dean, and rector of Ashton-under-Lyne. The organ, which has been built at a cost of about £560, is of fine tone and considerable power, and contains a large number of stops. In addition to the psalms and chants, the following music was introduced: Adagio cantabile, by Beethoven; Cantate and Deus misereatur, Bridgewater in A; Allen's anthem "In the beginning was the word"; an Offertory; Quartet (varied) by Haydn; "Fix'd in His everlasting seat," by Handel, and a Processional March composed by the Organist. The cost of the new organ will be covered by the collections made at the opening, and the proceeds arising from a Concert and subscriptions.

Littlehampton.—The recently formed Choral Society gave a miscellaneous Concert on the 9th ult. The programme consisted of glees, part-songs, &c., by the Choir, and vocal solos. The Rev. J. R. Lâmy (pianoforte), and Mr. Friend (violin), also contributed solos. Mr. J. Forbes Carter (Organist of St. Mary's) conducted.

Lowestoft.—On Thursday, January 29, Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion was performed, in aid of the Hospital, by a band and chorus of upwards of eighty performers. The principal artists engaged were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Hancock, Messrs. Christian and Mellor. Conductor, Mr. W. H. Pyemont.

Newtown.—The new organ erected in the Congregational Church by Messrs. Peter Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield, was opened on the 13th ult., by Mr. E. Minshall, Organist of the City Temple, London. The instrument, which has nineteen stops, all through, with one exception, and two manuals with two stops on the pedals, cost £335. Mr. Minshall gave a Recital in the afternoon, and in the evening, John Farmer's Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers was performed by an efficient choir, under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Gittins. The principal vocalist was Miss Woodhatch who rendered very effectively the solos apportioned her.

Norwich.—The seventeenth Concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union, and the first of the present season, took place in St. Andrew's Hall on the 19th ult., when there was the usual large attendance. The programme was nearly entirely devoted to pieces of a serious character. For the first part Hadyn's Passion Music was performed, the artists being Miss Bessie Hill, Miss Bertha Alden, Mr. Henry J. Minns, and Mr. F. C. Newnam. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and contained many items of novelty and interest. Foremost amongst these was the 130th Psalm, De Profundis, appropriately composed for the occasion by the Society's talented founder and Conductor, Dr. Bunnett. In this work, which was heard for the first time, Dr. Bunnett appears to have called forth his best and happiest efforts. The other novelty was a quartet, Benedictus, by Dr. Horace Hill, sung by Miss Hill, Miss Alden, Mr. Minns, and Mr. Cole. Mr. F. E. Newnam displayed a good baritone voice in Gounod's song "Nazareth." The band commenced the part with Adagio and Vivace, from Haydn's Symphony in E flat, and concluded with Handel's March "Scipio," both of which were well rendered. Mr. Walter Lain was Organist, and Mr. R. F. Wilkins Leader of the Band.

Nottingham.—A performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus was given in the Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday, the 3rd ult. The principals were Miss Arthur, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. F. King. Mr. Iron presided at the organ, and Mr. Henry Farmer conducted. The chorus was that of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Concert being the third of five Concerts announced by the Society this season. Miss Arthur sang with great care, the air "Wise men flattering" being especially worthy of approbation. In the duet "O lovely peace," the second voice was supplied by Miss Hoyte, an amateur member of the Society. Mr. Turner sang with much power, especially in the air "Sound an alarm." Mr. King, a comparative stranger to Nottingham, received the warmest applause after the air "Arm ye brave," in which he acquitted himself admirably. In the other airs, "The Lord worketh wonders," and "Rejoice, O Judah," he was equally successful. The chorus sang with great precision. Mr. Farmer conducted. —— On the 5th ult., a selection from Mendelssohn's Elijah was given in St. Thomas's Church. The principals were Miss Allen, Miss Hall, Messrs. Hooton, Beechy, and Castings. In the air, "Hear ye Israel," Miss Allen sang with much effect, the Church choir following with the chorus "Be not afraid." Miss Hall gave the air "O rest in the Lord" with great feeling, and Mr. Castings in the recitative and air "Ye people rend your hearts," sang with musician-like feeling. Messrs. Hooton and Beechy were highly effective in the bass music. Mr. Cockran, the Organist and Choirmaster, conducted throughout, and played at the close the "Allegro" from Mendelssohn's Concert in G.

Ottawa.—The first of three Classical Chamber Concerts was given in St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, January 20, by Mr. J. W. Harrison, assisted by Mrs. Thrower, vocalist, and M. Alfred Deserve, violinist, of Montreal. The programme opened with Beethoven's Trio in G major (Op. 1, No. 2) for violin, violoncello, and piano, in which M. Deserve, Messrs. R. Brewer and Harrison were the executants. All the movements were well rendered, and each instrument, whilst retaining its own individuality, contributed to an effective and intelligent reading of the whole. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Op. 64) was excellently played by M. Deserve. Mr. Harrison presided at the piano in all the instrumental numbers. The only solo he allotted himself was a selection from Schumann's Fantasiestücke "Soaring, Why, Whims," short pieces of a sketchy nature; the titles indicating the frame of mind under which they were composed. Each were characteristic and formed a pleasant contrast to the other instrumental items. The performance well merited the applause with which it was greeted. Some part-songs were well sung by some gentlemen amateurs. The Concert was a decided success.

Paisley.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the venerable Abbey, on Friday, January 30, the executants being the members of the Tonic Sol-fa Institute, a selection from the London Orchestra at present resident in Glasgow; and Madame Beasley, Miss Lilly Martin, and Messrs. H. A. Seligmann and A. L. Oswald, as principal vocalists. It is scarcely possible to give too much credit to Mr. Brown and his choristers for the substantial evidence they gave of excellent training, the precision of attack and correctness being observable in every part.

Plymouth.—The members of the Vocal Association gave the second Subscription Concert at the Guildhall, on the 4th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night, and the second of Mr. Henry Gadsby's Cantata The Lord of the Isles. Both works were well rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Orridge, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Mr. Bella member of the Association), and Mr. Ludwig. Mr. F. N. Löhr nducted, Mr. J. Pardew led the band, and Mr. A. C. Faull presided the organ.

Reading.—An Amateur Concert of more than ordinary interest was ven in the Foresters' Hall, on Monday evening, the 2nd ult., in aid the fund for a new Church in St. Mary's Parish. The Concert was anged and conducted by Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, Organist and Choir- ster of All Saints' Church, who selected for performance Dr. Stainer's red Cantata The Daughter of Jairus, which had not been previously oduced in Reading. The solos were rendered by Miss M. F. Hawker, ss Blanche Featherstone, Rev. H. S. Miles, and the Conductor, who tained considerable applause by his expressive rendering of the cting tenor song, "My hope is in the Everlasting." The melodious et, "Love divine!" given by Miss Blanche Featherstone and Mr. rbutt, was evidently considered the gem of the composition, although several effective choral numbers attracted much attention. The oruses were given with much precision and expression, the ult of thorough training by Mr. Tirbutt. Mrs. Daymond played the noforte part of the arranged accompaniments, and Mr. F. J. Read, us. Bac., Oxon., that of the harmonium. The Cantata was received st warmly by a large audience. The second part of the Concert sisted of songs, instrumental solos, and part-songs; the numbers aining special applause being Bishop's duet "As it fell upon a day," g by the Misses Hawker, a violin solo by Mr. Dowson, pianoforte os by Mr. Tirbutt, and Macfarren's part-song "The three fishers," ich was very expressively sung.

Rochester.—On Thursday, the 5th ult., Dr. Hans von Bülow gave ianoforte Recital at the New Corn Exchange, and fully vindicated claim to be considered one of the greatest of living pianists. The gramme was an attractive and in many respects a representative , and Dr. von Bülow, who played as usual from memory, was rmly applauded at the conclusion of the Recital. The Bechstein noforte, which was used at the performance, was remarkable for full, sympathetic quality of its tone. The attendance was so good as might reasonably have been anticipated.—— twenty-third Subscription Concert of the Rochester Choral iety was given on Monday, the 9th ult., at the New Corn hange, when Mendelssohn's Athalie and a miscellaneous ction was performed. Great praise is due to the Musical ctor, the Rev. W. H. Nutter, for the care bestowed upon the al rehearsals, and the difficulties presented in a work of so natic a character as Athalie were most creditably surmounted. orchestra, composed of portions of the bands of the Royal ineers and Royal Marines, and some amateurs, ably led by Mr. nett, executed the instrumental music with spirit. Miss Annie riott sang the solos allotted to the principal soprano with great natic power and feeling, and it is needless to say that the con- o solos were sung by Madame Patey with that finished refinement which the popular artist is so justly renowned. The second ano part was efficiently sung by Madame Mary Cummings, and Charles Fry, to whom fell the declaiming of the Lyrics, displayed ined elocution which has already gained him high commendation. second part opened with a new Concert Overture for full orchestra, he Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley. It consists of a Maestoso retto, Andantino con espressione, and Tempo di Marcia. It after the exacting performance of Athalie, accepted as a light duction to the second part, and was received with very hearty use. The rest of the programme comprised ballads by the already named, a violin solo ("Souvenir d'Afrique," by Moeser), rably played by Mr. Burnett, and a Fantasia on Martha, arranged e harp and performed by Herr Oberthür, and concluded with the val March from Tannhäuser for chorus and orchestra. According e custom of the Society a public rehearsal was given on the pre- g Saturday, when the solo music was efficiently rendered by Miss nna, Miss Longhurst, Miss Cravino, and Miss Turner, Mr. es Fry reciting the Lyrics, and the performance being conducted e Rev. W. H. Nutter. On both evenings the hall was completely many persons being unable on the Saturday evening to gain sion.

Albans.—An Evening Concert was given by Mr. and Mrs. Ryder on Tuesday, January 27, in the School-room, the Rev. J. y, Vicar, in the chair. The programme consisted of Locke's th music, and a miscellaneous selection. The rendering of the is choruses was especially good. Pianoforte pieces were played sses Fowler, Marsden, Lamb, and Master Jones. A violin solo dmirably rendered by Master G. E. Ryder, and was redemanded. ocalists were Miss Phillips, Miss Hardwick, and Mr. Fleetwood. Concert was very successful.

Mary Cray, Kent.—The first Concert of the Crays and Orping- usical Association was given in the Educational Institute on the t., to a large audience, the programme consisting of vocal and mental music, sacred and secular. The choir sang in a very endable manner. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Burchall, Miss lding, Miss C. M. Ball, Messrs. Topney, and Packman, and the and chorus was composed of local amateurs, forty performers, the leadership of Mr. J. Smith. Mr. J. Phillips conducted, and Jenkins presided at the harmonium and piano.

onto.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their oncert this season in the Pavilion of the Horticultural Gardens 5th ult. The selection included the Walpurgis Night (Mendels- Andante from Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; and the Allegro io from Beethoven's C minor Concerto. In the Walpurgis Night lo vocalists were Miss Corlett and Messrs. Warrington and , who sang their respective parts with care, and their efforts ed a warm recognition. The chorus sang admirably, and the tra did wonders with the characteristic music of the accompani- The Allegro con brio from Beethoven's Concerto was played s Boyd (pupil of Mr. Torrington), accompanied by the orchestra. oforte solo was also contributed by Miss Hague. M. Deserve, g Canadian violinist from Montreal, played Leonard's Fantasia rtha, and won a genuine success. Vocal solos were given by McManus, pupil of Mr. Torrington, and Miss Gaudin. Mr. Tor- n conducted.

Trowbridge.—The inaugural Concert of the newly formed Musical Society was given on the 21st ult., at Hill Hall, and was attended by a large and appreciative audience. The first part of the programme consisted of glees, madrigals, part-songs, &c., together with several instrumental pieces played by the orchestra, which has been formed in connection with this Society. The second part was devoted to a complete performance of Professor G. A. Macfarren's May Day. Mr. W. P. Collins presided at the piano; Mr. W. Millington led the band, and Mr. H. Millington and Major Clark conducted.

Turnham Green.—The series of entertainments for the season 1879-80, given in aid of useful and charitable objects, was brought to a close by a Concert at the Vestry Hall on Wednesday, the 18th ult. Among the numbers calling for special mention were two flute solos, "Scène Dramatique" and "Allegro de Concert," played by Mr. C. Spencer West; two duets, sung by Miss Annie Kinnaird and Miss Fanny Edwards, both encored, as were also their songs. "The Roamers," with Mr. J. H. Maunder as Conductor, contributed the part-songs "Farewell to the Forest" and "Good-night, farewell," and Miss Katie Vaughan played brilliantly two pianoforte solos. Songs were also sung by Miss Marian Tracey, the Misses Julie and Rosie Albu, and Mr. F. L. Robinson.

Waltham Abbey.—A Concert was given in the Boys' School-room on the 2nd ult., at which Mdlle. Hélène Greiffenhagen, Miss F. Montgomery, Mr. G. Coventry (who replaced Mr. John Child, indisposed), Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. A. Moore appeared. Mr. Frank Manly and Mr. David Beardwell conducted, and also performed two pianoforte duets.

Warrington.—A new comic Opera called The Happy Valley, composed by Mr. T. Mee Pattison, was produced on Tuesday, the 10th ult., with much success. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Washford.—A very successful Concert was given by the Washford Musical Association, on January 29, at the Railway Hotel. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental music, the composition of Dr. G. A. Macfarren, and included his Cantata May Day. Mr. T. J. Dudeney, the Organist of Dunster Church, to whose careful and sedulous training much of the success which attended this Concert is due, conducted. Two Overtures were given by the orchestra with excellent effect. The singing throughout was exceedingly good, being careful, steady, and characterised by expression.

West Hartlepool.—The programme of the Hartlepool Philharmonic Society's Concert consisted chiefly of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, which was performed for the first time in the Hartlepools on Friday, the 6th ult. The hall was crowded, numbers being unable to find accommodation. The principal vocalists were Miss Rathbone, Miss J. Dand, Mr. G. H. Welsh, R.A.M. (Durham Cathedral), and Mr. John Melton (Durham Cathedral); Mr. J. H. Lewis, Conductor.

Wisbech.—The first Concert in connection with the Mechanics' Institute Choral Society was given in the Public Hall on Thursday, January 29. The first part of the programme was devoted to Weber's Jubilee Cantata, the solos being taken by Miss Hélène Greiffenhagen, Mr. W. B. Pywell, and Mr. S. Duffell. Miss Greiffenhagen's rendering of "How blest is he" was much admired; and Mr. Duffel, in the air "So once our prayer," was also highly effective. The band and chorus of sixty performers gave evidence of very careful training. Miss Mason presided at the piano, and Mr. Charles King, Organist of the parish church, conducted. The Concert was a great success.

Wolverhampton.—The Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society gave, for the first time since the Festival of 1871, a performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson on Monday, January 26. The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Mr. R. Hilton, and Mr. D. Harrison. Solo trumpet, Mr. Robinson; Accompanist, Mr. Mann. The choruses were admirably rendered, especially "Then round about the starry throne." Mr. Stockley conducted.

York.—On the 2nd ult. Mr. Charles Hallé gave an Orchestral Concert at the Festival Concert Rooms. An excellent programme, well calculated to test the capabilities of the band, was gone through, and listened to with the utmost attention by the audience. Mr. Hallé performed two pianoforte solos.——On the 17th ult. Mr. Mapleson's Operatic Company gave a Concert, at which Mdlles. Ilma di Murska and Darialli, Madame Marie Roze, Signori Tecchi and Susini, and Mr. Carleton appeared. The various items of the programme were well received, Mr. Carleton being very successful in his singing of Molloy's "Rose-Marie." Mdlle. Sacconi's harp solos were also much appreciated.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. T. Elston Rigby, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Thomas's, Preston.—Mr. E. W. Taylor, Mus. Bac., F.C.O., Organist to St. Mary's Parish Church, Stafford.—Mr. R. B. Carmichael, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Andrew's Church, Maghull, Lancashire.—Mr. J. G. Bolland Elliot, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's, Haggerston.—Mr. George C. Upjohn, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Michael and All Angels London Fields.

THE ONLY COMPLETE EDITION
CONTAINING BOOKS 7 and 8.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE."

"A. FETIS,
"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist.

CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.
"D. MAGNUS."

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.

"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal frame-work used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

"These Pianos have received the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

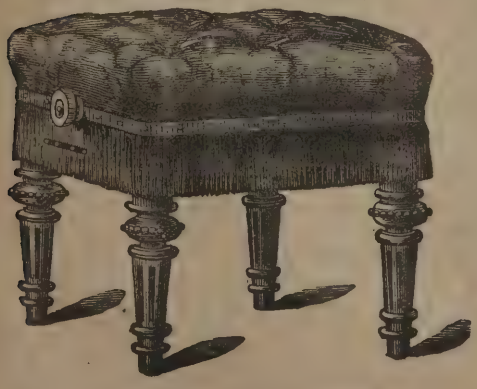
PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")



This Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

Price Lists and Illustrations free on application to us or to any Musicseller, through whom these Stools and other articles of Music Furniture can be obtained.

GROVE TESTIMONIAL FUND.—On the occasion of Mr. George Grove's retirement from the Board of the Crystal Palace Company, it is proposed to offer him a public recognition of the value of the services which he has rendered to music in connection with the Saturday Concerts. It is thought that the same opportunity may not unfitly be taken advantage of to testify to the value of his labours in behalf of Biblical History and Geography in connexion with the Palestine Exploration Fund and the Dictionary of the Bible.

With this object it is proposed to raise a fund by subscription, and to employ the proceeds as may hereafter be determined by the Committee.

Subscriptions are invited, and should be paid in to the Grove Testimonial Fund, at the London and County Bank, Hanover Square, as soon as possible. Committee.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
APRIL 1, 1880.

MUSICAL EDUCATION ABROAD AND AT HOME.

The general subject of musical education is familiar to readers of "The Musical Times." Alive, as every one must be who gives the matter a thought, to its enormous importance, not only from an artistic but from a moral and social point of view, we let slip no opportunity of enlisting public sympathy on its behalf. Especially have we given prominence to the subject of musical instruction in elementary schools. This everybody must recognise as, with regard to our art, the subject of subjects. It is all very well to enlarge the scope and improve the character of higher musical education, nor can too much be attempted in this way. But even more important is the work of lifting the mass of the people to the level of some sort of artistic attainment and culture. By doing this, and only by doing it, can we utilise the national aptitude in the direction of higher achievement, and prevent the national talent—it may be the genius also—from running to waste. Two articles which appeared in our columns not long ago are probably well remembered as bearing upon the subject now again taken up. They were separated by exactly twelve months of time, and each marked a distinct step in advance, either as actually taken or suggested. In May, 1878, Mr. H. Heathcote Statham discussed the whole question of national musical education, strongly insisting, with respect to primary schools, upon teaching music by note, instead of dinning melodies into the ears of the children till they are fastened upon their memories; contending further for the value of Mr. Hullah's recommendation that there should be inspectors of music, and going further than Mr. Hullah in arguing that every gentleman who writes "H. M.'s Inspector of Schools" after his name should be competent to assess the merits of musical instruction, to which end the writer would have music made a recognised subject at our Universities. A year later we noticed a discussion on the same topic, originated at a sitting of the Social Science Congress by Mr. Hullah, who announced that he was about to make a tour for the purpose of studying the systems of elementary musical instruction adopted in various foreign countries. On that occasion we again contended for a systematic teaching of music in our own schools, and asserted that imparting tunes by ear and paying for the results achieved were "simply a waste of the children's time and public money." It is now evident that the project of reform developed somewhat in the interval between the writing of these articles. In 1878, Mr. Hullah himself, perhaps, scarcely dreamed of a continental trip under the auspices of "my lords"—an event for which their lordships could not possibly find that which the official mind so dearly loves, a precedent. But in 1879, Mr. Hullah set out, at the bidding of the Department, and armed with letters from the English Minister of Foreign Affairs to Her Majesty's representatives in the capitals of the countries to be visited. His Report was laid upon the table of the House of Commons the other day, and there significantly attested that the subject of primary musical education, like "John Brown's soul," is "marching on." To this document we now invite attention, premising that, as to one of the States through which Mr. Hullah passed, we were able to anticipate somewhat his information. In "The Musical Times" for July last appeared a very interesting and lucid article on "Musical Instruction in German Schools," from the pen of Dr. W. Langhans of Berlin. Valuable at the time of publication, that paper is of still more worth now, since it enables us to read Mr. Hullah's Report, as far as concerns Germany, by the light of a resident specialist, thoroughly master of his subject. That the resident and the visitor substantially agree furnishes a reason why the Report should be trusted when it takes us beyond the limits of the empire.

Recognising in it a sign of progress, Mr. Hullah begins by calling attention to the fact that his mission had no recorded precedent, and then goes on to prepare us for the disturbance of some general and accepted notions. He set out on his tour with "large expectancy" as to German achievement in musical education, and says that "recognising in the Germans the people who in modern times have given to the world the most and the best musical works, I hope to be pardoned for having expected to find the readers and performers of these more numerous in their country than in any other, and the teachers in whatever class of school more skilful and the methods of teaching better." He adds: "How far these expectations have been justified will be seen hereafter." We are thus prepared for an upsetting of the fabric of German supremacy in music, as far, at least, as popular education is concerned, and the upsetting duly takes place.

Entering Germany from Switzerland, Mr. Hullah halted at Stuttgardt, and visited two Protestant schools, a Roman Catholic school, and an asylum for blind children. "In the first I heard seven classes, all newly formed. In all of these, the reading was most elementary, or, I might say, non-existent. They sang chorals, or very simple songs, mostly, I think, 'by ear,' certainly always without books. One teacher I found exercising a class on a scale of F, which he had written on a board without the flat before the fourth sound. This, however, the children themselves supplied in singing, unconsciously no doubt to themselves, and possibly to him also." The second school was of a higher grade, and the work "less unreal, though still very unsatisfactory. What was done was done chiefly by ear. The theory was of the meagrest possible description, and the teaching generally as little 'educational' as it was possible to make it." In the Roman Catholic establishment "the boys sang very coarsely, and evidently knew nothing of music. The girls knew something, and sang much better than the boys. With a good deal of help they got through a very short and simple passage I wrote for them." Beyond the schools mentioned, Mr. Hullah does not appear to have gone. Astonished and confounded, he shook the dust of Würtemberg off his feet, and hied away to Bavaria in hope of better things. Better things were actually found in Munich, though the English visitor was startled by hearing that in the Bavarian schools singing from notes is not taught to any child under the age of ten—"in my opinion four, possibly five years too late." But the instruction, once begun, is well imparted; and Mr. Hullah speaks in high terms of what he saw at the Training School of Freising, where they have "a veritable orchestra of stringed instruments," and where a real concert was prepared for the foreign guest. Mr. Hullah adds—and here his criticism of Bavaria begins and ends—"If the work subsequently done in the elementary school be not of corresponding thoroughness, which it is to be feared is too often the case, the shortcoming must be chiefly due to the long delay in introducing the school children to musical notation."

Vienna disappointed Mr. Hullah sorely. There, in the "city of the masters," he naturally, if not very logically, expected great things, and met with small ones. Of this a high official warned him at the outset, saying, "with a melancholy smile and shake of the head, 'You will find very little.'" Mr. Hullah tersely adds, "He was right." Music seems to be well taught in the training schools, but the children, even those connected with such institutions, are mostly left to do as best they can "by ear." Referring to the pupils of one establishment, the Report says: "Their power of reading was the smallest conceivable. I wrote a few bars on a board in C, with an F♯ and a B♭ introduced, but they failed utterly in singing them, even after three or four trials." Mr. Hullah would willingly have pushed his investigations farther, but, he adds: "I was discouraged alike by what I had seen and heard, and by reports of what I had not. The singing was, I was assured, in all such (elementary) schools 'by ear.'" It is easy to imagine the English Commissioner's disgust and disappointment on finding this state of things in Vienna, of all places in the world. Leaving the Austrian capital, Mr. Hullah made his way to Prague, recovering his spirits en route, along with his optimist mood. In Bohemia, without doubt, he would recognise the most musical country of Europe. Did not Dr. Burney visit a school at Czaslau and find "little children of both sexes, from six to ten or eleven years old, who were reading, writing, playing on violins, hautbois, bassoons, and other instruments"? Assuredly he tells us that he did, and it is no wonder Mr. Hullah took heart and went into Prague with a smiling face. But, alas for the vanity of human wishes! "Your lordships may judge of my dismay when I heard from Herr Pivoda that the state of things described by Burney and others, though till recently existent, was now a thing of the past; that not only were 'the violin, the hautbois, the bassoon, and other instruments' no longer to be found in Bohemian schools, but that even singing was little practised there, and singing from notes scarcely at all!" Mr. Hullah, now again cast down, and, one might imagine, unpleasantly suspicious of hunting a will-o'-the-wisp, proceeded to verify this astonishing information, and had no difficulty in doing so. In the Bürgerschule of Prague he found music taught to only three out of eight classes. The girls sang "sweetly and in tune, though very much out of time, leaving out a rest here and a dot there, without the slightest apparent consciousness of the slaughter they were dealing out to the rhythm of what they sang. The boys of the corresponding class knew absolutely nothing." In one or two other schools the results proved a little better, but were not Mr. Hullah's word, like the virtue of Cæsar's wife, beyond suspicion, we might hesitate to believe him when he tells us that the young women at the Bohemian Training School showed "the smallest conceivable" power of reading music. "They could do next to nothing in it. After two or three failures I gave up testing them, even with the simplest passages, in despair." Their singing, however, showed the musical capabilities of their race, and also what Mr. Hullah calls "the cumulative results of many generations of practised vocalism." He almost makes one contemplate a journey to Prague when he tells us that "no such sound from choir or band had ever before fallen on my ear; no vocal organs so sweet, so strong, so extensive in compass, so beautifully modulated, so perfectly in tune. Soprani mounting 'clear and compact' again and again to B and even to C; mezzo-soprani of the richest conceivable timbre, and contralti descending easily and sonorously to D and even C—notes only just within the reach of ordinary tenors. As a musical result it would be impossible to say too much of what these young people did." Surely it is a sin and a shame to neglect the splendid natural qualifications of the Bohemian people! but we gather from the Report that present neglect represents reaction from the undue favour shown to music in years past. Exalted above its due then, the art is now abased far below the position it has a right to occupy. There is hope in this state of things, since another rebound is certain, and with it matters may properly adjust themselves.

Going on to Saxony, Mr. Hullah inspected in Dresden the male and female Normal Schools, a Bürgerschule for girls, and the Kapellknaben Institute. In the Normal Schools musical education was considered "generally satisfactory," though many of the young men come up ignorant of the art. But the children of the Bürgerschule were found—can we imagine it!—singing by ear only. "There is no teaching by note in the elementary schools of Dresden—à fortiori in the provincial schools of Saxony." Leipzig hardly presented, in this respect, an improvement upon Dresden. The children sang "with more or less sweetness and spirit, but with a full amount of that looseness of time always attendant on singing, or approximately singing, by ear—invariable in the elementary schools of Leipzig as of Dresden." Prussia was the last of the German States visited, and in Berlin our Commissioner ran to earth something like what he had been so long hunting. "The schools in Berlin are many, and the number of scholars in those I visited is very large. The teaching of music in them I found also generally superior to that in any that had come under my notice in other parts of Germany." A single brief extract will give a fair idea of how music is taught and learned in the elementary schools of Berlin: "In a Bürgerschule under Professor Hermann Prüfer a class of boys from eight to nine years of age sang first some songs from memory, then a number of passages from a 'ladder,' and afterwards from musical notes. This was throughout very satisfactory. After this a higher class, ages twelve to fifteen, sang some motetts by Grell and others, and finally some passages which I wrote on a board, readily and correctly. This was the best class of children that I had met with for a long time. Subsequently I accompanied Herr Prüfer to a mixed private school where a class of girls read at sight a new choral, and another of boys did even better. The power of attention and manifest desire to learn in both these classes were worthy of all praise." But while Mr. Hullah could write thus of the Prussian schools, in those of neighbouring Hanover—the elementary free schools at all events—he discovered that "there is no singing from notes," and, therefore, he had no inducement to spend time in visiting more than a sample.

In the closing section of his Report, Mr. Hullah deals at some length with the subject of German musical education, and his remarks may fitly be considered here. First of all, he cannot see that German children have any advantage over English ones in natural aptitude, and he holds the comfortable belief that "the so-called 'natural' musical power of the English people is equal to that of the German or any other people." Here, of course, he has to meet the fact that Germany stands at the head of musical nations. Face to face with it, Mr. Hullah pertinently says that Germany, as we now understand the word, comprises many races, and that its music is the result of the highest culture of Teutons, Bohemians, Poles, Hungarians, and Scandinavians, who, in the aggregate, are undoubtedly superior to the Anglo-Saxon. The real matter is that we English do not properly cultivate our musical gifts. It may be replied that neither, on Mr. Hullah's own showing, do the Germans. True, but there is something, nay a great deal, in the fact that the German teachers are far better trained than ours. As to the German Normal Schools, Mr. Hullah says: "Higher musical attainment is generally a condition of entry to them; residence is longer by some years; skill in instrumental music is more generally disseminated and more of it is required; and to each school a professor, commonly of great attainments and reputation, devotes the whole or the best part of his time." The result of this is that competent musical instructors are scattered broadcast over the land, and, although they may not be able to do great things with the children under their care, their artistic influence in every town and village must be immense and productive of excellent results. Our own course in view of this state of things is clear, and our prospects are encouraging. If Mr. Hullah's experience be true with regard to all Germany, English elementary schools are in advance rather than in rear of those belonging to our cousins. In very many of the former the children are able to read music, while in most some form of notation is taught with greater or less success. Assuming that a race for superiority is now about to begin we are clearly "in it," therefore, and need not despair of a good "place."

Passing from Germany to Holland, Mr. Hullah visited a school at the Hague, of which he says: "They not only sang what they knew, various songs in three parts, but one or two easy passages which I wrote on the board, readily and correctly, noting, before they began, two or three faults and omissions I had made purposely—e.g., an imperfect bar, a wrong time signature, and the like." The impression thus conveyed of excellent work in Holland, was strengthened by succeeding observation. In a school at Rotterdam, the music sung was "more difficult than that sung in the school I first visited. Two passages, involving some difficult intervals, syncopations, modulations, and the like, which I wrote on a board, they sang admirably." Again in the Hague a class of poor sailors' children "read fairly," and, once more at Rotterdam, a Normal School class sang some very difficult passages "at once and faultlessly," besides correcting some faulty harmony progressions "without a moment's hesitation." The excellence of Holland in elementary musical knowledge was found to be rivalled by that of Belgium. In the Ecole Communale (No. 6) for girls at Brussels, "the lowest class had begun well, the second had made much progress, and the third (highest) was able to read as well as sing admirably, and showed themselves conversant with a fair amount of theory. In the Ecole Communale for boys the results were even better. They sang, of course, many pieces already studied, and these with agreeable timbre and much taste. More than this, they read more and more difficult passages which I was incited by their instructor, M. Auguste Landa, to write, some of them in two parts, with a spirit and correctness of intonation that could hardly have been exceeded." In another class "the pupils showed an extensive and accurate acquaintance with musical theory—e.g., with the three forms of the minor scale, and sang well in time and tune what they had studied and what they had not. All the classes in this school sing from notes; the youngest children learn their songs so, none by ear. In another Ecole Communale for boys somewhat younger than those in the Ecole Modèle, the scholars read passages in two parts at sight, and sang a number of part-songs very well indeed; and in an Ecole Libre (No. 4) a class under the direction of M. Defalgue did quite as well?" Without going into details respecting musical education in elementary Swiss schools, it may be said that the work done by the Helvetian teachers is, on Mr. Hullah's showing, superior to that achieved in Germany, and but little inferior to the results obtained in the Low Countries.

Now the great question arises, How is it that Switzerland, Holland, and Belgium are able to win such an honourable distinction? Mr. Hullah answers thus: "The schools of Holland and Belgium more especially present instances without number of children of the humblest class, of the ages of nine and ten, who can not only sing what they have learnt with taste and refinement, but sing at sight passages of considerable difficulty with as much ease and evident intelligence as they would show in reading literary passages within the range of their comprehension. The teaching of notes has gone along with or immediately followed the teaching of letters, and the one has presented no greater difficulty than the other." Moreover—and this is to the point—the music teaching in Brussels is frequently and competently inspected. "A musician of high repute, M. Auguste Bouillon, makes occasional 'surprise' visits to every school in Brussels during the hours when the music lessons should be going on, notes whether the teacher and his class are at work, hears the lesson, or a portion of it, and makes his remark publicly to the class as it goes on, and to the teacher privately when it is over. This organisation, as yet extended to the capital only, is in process of extension to the whole country."

What must we do in England to outpace Germany and run side by side with the Low Countries? On this point Mr. Hullah has naturally something to say, and he begins by assuring us that we start in the race heavily handicapped, because, first, continental children remain longer at school than ours; second, more teaching force is brought to bear upon them; third, they show greater power of attention and eagerness to learn. But at least two of these hindrances to success may be removed, and in the natural progress of events will disappear. As education becomes more and more valued by generations of parents who have themselves experienced its worth, the children will remain at school longer, and for the same reason will greater teaching power be in request. As to the listlessness and carelessness of English children, we trust that Mr. Hullah has generalised somewhat too hastily. Indeed, it may fairly be questioned whether he knows enough of the boys and girls in our elementary schools to be able to speak with authority. But, assuming the worst, we must hope that zeal for knowledge may become a national instinct as the acquisition of knowledge grows into a national practice. It is a fact that qualities of this sort may be cultivated like any other, and no one need despair of seeing English children as anxious to learn as those who, on the Continent, are the outcome of generations of school-going.

The practical measures suggested by Mr. Hullah comprise a fuller musical education of those among students in training colleges who show especial talent, and their after employment as teachers of music exclusively, each in an assigned group of elementary schools. It may be doubted whether some of the best men in a profession not overstocked should be taken from general and transferred to special duties, the more because there is no lack of teachers in the musical profession who could discharge, and would be glad to discharge, the proposed functions. On the other hand, only good could arise from a further development of musical instruction in training colleges, provided of course the time so taken up be not out of proportion to that occupied by other and more essential subjects. Mr. Hullah further insists upon an efficient inspection of music in elementary schools, and here we are entirely with him. In the article to which reference has already been made, Mr. H. H. Statham contended that the ordinary Inspector of Schools should perfect his music as he does his mathematics at the University, and be equally qualified to judge of both. The day may come when Mr. Statham will have his wish, but it is yet very far off; and meanwhile, something must be done by way—to put the matter on its lowest or commercial footing—of guarantee that the nation receives value for the money it expends on musical instruction. The new Code just issued offers a shilling per head for all children who are taught notation, and only sixpence for those who learn to sing by ear. As a result, we shall find notation taught in the vast majority of schools, and unless a change be made, the results will have to be estimated by, in many cases, non-musical inspectors, "which is absurd." With regard to the proposed new inspectorate, Mr. Hullah's present suggestion strikes us as a little ambitious, and perhaps too costly to be practical. He has in view the employment of such dignitaries as the professors of the contemplated National College of Music; but this would surely involve a waste of power, while gentlemen of their standing could not be expected to go wandering about the country for a trifle. We find much more real value in Mr. Hullah's original plan of selecting from the musical residents in each locality some one competent to assist the ordinary Inspector, provided help of the kind be needed. The idea is recommended by cheapness and practicability, both of them qualities which just now must be clearly demonstrated before "my lords" will take a step forward or the public will sustain them in doing so. Mr. Hullah may, we think, confidently reckon upon carrying his point, provided his demands are as modest as possible consistent with securing the object in view. Then, and only then, matters will be en train for the fair development of English musical aptitude. For the first time the masses will be taught music in the true sense of the term, and a way opened up along which talent that would have remained mute and inglorious may advance to the front and speak.

CLAUDIO MONTEVERDE.

By W. S. Rockstro.

The success of "Arianna" was only exceeded by that of "Orfeo," produced, also in Mantua, in 1608. Though so little of the first work has been preserved to us, we know enough about it to feel sure that it was in no wise so great an Opera as its successor. In this, Monteverde has used an orchestra the weight of which must have seemed overwhelming indeed to the musicians of his day; and he has, moreover, employed it in a way which fully entitles him to claim the honour of having absolutely invented that system of instrumentation which we still regard as the life of the lyric drama. His early predilection for the viol helped him as much in this matter as it had before tended to hinder his success in polyphonic composition, by implanting an ineradicable taste for instrumental forms of expression. He used this favourite instrument largely in his accompaniments, as may be seen from the following synopsis of the orchestra required for "Orfeo," in which seventeen out of the thirty-six instruments mentioned are of the viol species:

Duoi gravicembani.
Duoi contrabassi de viola.
Dieci viole da brazzo.
Un arpa doppia.
Duoi violini piccoli alla Francese.
Duoi chitaroni.
Duoi organi di legno.
Tre bassi da gamba.
Quattro tromboni.
Un regale.
Duoi cornetti.
Un flautino alla vigesima seconda.
Un clarino, con tre trombe sordine.

These instruments were so combined as to give the greatest possible variety of colouring to the several accompaniments; not, as Hawkins would lead us to believe, by the reservation of a separate instrument for every character in the drama, but by a careful adaptation of the means employed to the exigencies of the situation to be illustrated: just as, two centuries later, the trombones in "Il Don Giovanni" were reserved, by Mozart, to add to the horror inspired by the first appearance of the Statue. And this is not the only particular in which "Orfeo" anticipates much which is generally regarded as peculiar to the lyric drama of our own day. By far the greater part of the Opera is in continuous recitative; and, even when more regular melody is introduced, it is not always easy to separate it from the purely declamatory strain it is intended to relieve. The closest attention is always paid both to the sense and the oratorical expression of the words, and musical effect is always unhesitatingly sacrificed to dramatic truth. One other coincidence is too singular to be passed over without notice. Most of us are accustomed to look upon the Introduction to "Das Rheingold"—formed upon one single chord, with one single bass note sustained throughout from beginning to end—as the most original piece of music that ever was composed. The Overture to "Orfeo" (here called Toccata) is formed upon one single chord, and has one single bass note sustained throughout from beginning to end. It is true that the earlier composition contains no more than nine bars, thrice repeated, while the later one, by reason of its fuller development, occupies 136: but this difference in length by no means lessens the strangeness of the analogy between the two. Nor is this analogy rendered any the less striking because it is manifestly accidental, but rather the reverse. For, taken in combination with the other coincidences we have pointed out, it serves to prove that dramatic truth cannot be claimed as the exclusive inheritance of any given epoch, still less as the personal property of any individual composer. It has been turned to good account by thoughtful writers of every age, and its value was certainly not underrated by Monteverde, though probably not half a dozen students now living have ever seriously studied his works or even seen his singular Overture. Happily for his reputation, "Orfeo" was not suffered to perish like its predecessor, "Arianna," but was published in a complete form at Venice, in 1609, and again printed in 1615. Both editions are now exceedingly rare; but a copy of the second, once the property of Sir John Hawkins, is preserved in the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace. Copious extracts from the Opera will be found in the Histories of Hawkins and Burney; and we here reprint the Overture, for the first time, in full, together with the delicious Ritornello which serves as its second movement. Had this Ritornello been printed, in mistake, by the editors of Mendelssohn's posthumous works, very few critics would have ventured to doubt its authenticity, though some might, perhaps, have said that the great modern composer had exceeded himself in the boldness of his dissonant combinations. The original score is written in five parts, for wind-instruments and viols; the upper part of the Toccata being played throughout upon the trumpet (clarino). We have been careful in our example to include every note indicated in the printed copy:—

"Toccata che si suona auanti il leuar de la tela tre volte con tutti li stromenti, & si fa un Tuono più alto volendo sonar le trombe con le sordine."

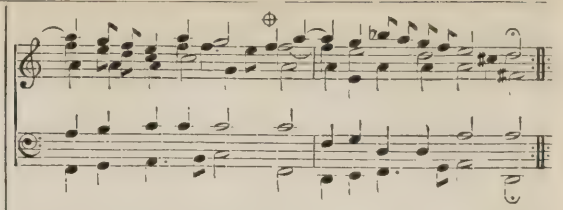
* At this mark the two upper parts cross, the first taking the minim and the second the two crotchets. They remain thus inverted until the sign (⊕), when they resume their natural position, the first taking the two crotchets and the second the minim.



"Orfeo" was followed in the same year, 1608, by "Il Ballo delle Ingrate," a mythological spectacle, containing some highly characteristic dance music, moulded into forms before unknown, and replete with rhythmic changes of a singularly interesting character. This was the last dramatic work produced by the composer during his residence in Mantua. It may seem strange that, after having given three such convincing proofs of a skill transcending all previous experience, he should have been contented to subside for a time into silence, instead of following up his triumph by a succession of Operas as ambitious, at least, as those he had already given to the world. But we must remember that, in these early times, the lyric drama had no fixed home. It was only in the palaces of princes that it could be heard at all; and even there the immense amount of preparation necessary to ensure a successful representation, and the enormous sums of money unavoidably lavished upon it, caused it to be justly regarded as an entertainment fitted only for occasions of extraordinary public rejoicing. An occasion of this kind was happily provided by the marriage of Francesco Gonzaga, but princely weddings are events of rare occurrence.

Monteverde remained ten years in the service of the Duke of Mantua, and only quitted it at last on receiving a call to still higher duties. On the death of Giulio Cesare Martinengo, in the year 1613, he was elected maestro di cappella at the Cathedral of S. Mark, in Venice. This circumstance cannot but have been most gratifying to him. The invitation was entirely spontaneous on the part of the proccuratori, and was prompted solely by the wide-spread fame of his now universally acknowledged talent. No maestro in Italy, save the head of the Pontifical Choir, enjoyed a more honourable position, or one better calculated to lead to enduring celebrity, than that which was offered for his acceptance. Moreover, the terms in which the offer was made were flattering beyond all precedent. No previous maestro had received a stipend exceeding 200 ducats per annum. Monteverde's was fixed at 300. A further sum of fifty ducats was allowed for the expenses of his journey. A house was provided for him in the Canons' Close, a privilege quite contrary to the established usage. And, three years later, on August 24, 1616, his salary was augmented to 400 ducats, in order—to use the words of the original contract—that he might be persuaded to live and die in the service of the Republic. It was manifestly to his interest to do so. He was at this time a widower, with two sons, both of whom accompanied him to his new home and prospered there exceedingly; the younger, Massimiliano, becoming a noted physician; while the elder, Francesco, developing a fine tenor voice, was received into the Cathedral Choir, with an annual stipend of seventy ducats (afterwards increased to eighty), and was eventually admitted to holy orders. The Venetians did all that in them lay to prove their sincere respect for the maestro they had chosen. No wonder that he became devotedly attached to the city of his adoption, or that he delighted in signing himself thenceforth, "Claudio Monteverde, Veneziano."

The duties attached to the office Monteverde had accepted were, at this time, very heavy. Besides composing for the cathedral, directing the performance of the music, and training the numerous choir, he was expected to furnish new compositions for every festival, great or small, connected with the state. He threw himself into the work with heart and soul, and gave the most perfect satisfaction to all concerned, making powerful friends on every side. His fame spread far and wide. In 1620 he visited Bologna, the city in which, twenty years' previously, Artusi's memorable strictures had been published. All previous heartburnings were forgotten. The Bolognese received him with acclamation. A body of the most influential citizens met him at S. Michele in Bosco, to welcome his appearance with music and orations, and the Accademia Florida admitted him as an honorary member, and inscribed his name among those of the Filomusi.

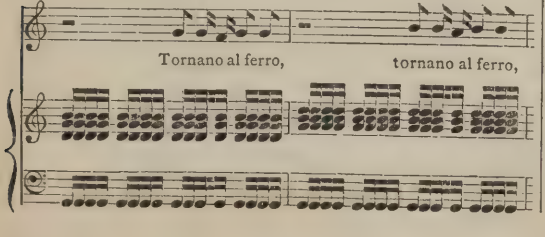
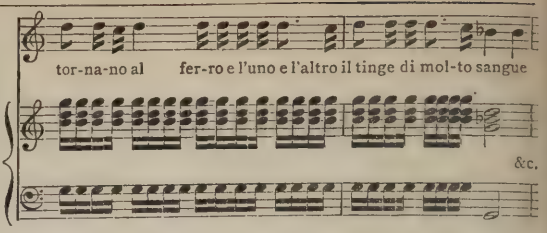
On May 25, 1621, the Florentine strangers resident in Venice celebrated a grand Funeral Service in the Church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, in memory of the death of Duke Cosmo II. Monteverde composed the music for the occasion, and the "Requiem" he produced is described in glowing colours by Giulio Strozzi, who tells us that the sad "Instrumental Symphony," moving its auditors to tears, was written "in imitation of the antient Mixolydian Mode invented by Sappho"; while the "Dies Iræ" and the "De profundis," sung at the Elevation of the Host, resembled "a dialogue between the Holy Souls in Purgatory and the Angels visiting them." This ill-judged encomium is only too suggestive. Strozzi was an enthusiastic disciple of the Bardi school, which condemned counterpoint as an antiquated barbarism, and cared for nothing but the newly invented monodic style; and, though no trace of the "Requiem" remains to verify the fact, we cannot doubt, from what he says, that Monteverde had already carried his dramatic effects into the Church.

Fortunately, opportunities were not wanting for the employment of dramatic talent in a more legitimate sphere. In the year 1624 Girolamo Mocenigo gave an entertainment in his palace, for which Monteverde composed a grand Interlude, called "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," founded on an episode in Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata." This remarkable piece—which is printed at length at the end of the "Eighth Book of Madrigals"—introduces orchestral effects more bold and startling by far than those which created so profound a sensation in "Orfeo"; amongst others, pizzicato passages for the stringed instruments, and a genuine tremolo, used so nearly in the way in which we use it now, that it might easily be made to pass muster in an opera by Gounod or Meyerbeer. None but an accomplished violist could ever have invented such an effect. Common as such passages are now, this was looked upon as quite an extraordinary phenomenon, then; so much so that, as the composer himself tells us in his preface to the volume in which this work is contained, the members of the orchestra refused at first to play it. It was only with great difficulty that they were brought to a better mind; but, when once the experiment had been fairly tried, all present acknowledged its complete success.





In the year 1627 Monteverde was invited to the Court of Parma, where he composed five Intermezzi, illustrating the story of Bradamante, and that of Dido. In 1629 he composed a Cantata, entitled "Il Rosajo fiorito," to celebrate the birthday of the son of Vito Morosini, governor of Rovigo. A still finer opportunity for display was afforded, in 1630, by the marriage of Giustiniana, daughter of Girolamo Mocenigo, with Lorenzo Giustiniani. For this occasion Monteverde composed a grand Opera, written by Giulio Strozzi, and entitled "Proserpina Rapita," a work which contained so many choruses, dances, and recitatives, combined with so much novel instrumentation, and so great a multitude of magnificent scenic effects, that it bade fair to eclipse the fame of all his previous efforts.

The year 1630 was rendered memorable by a fearful national calamity—a pestilence, which broke out almost immediately after the marriage at the Palazzo Mocenigo, and in the space of sixteen months destroyed no less than fifty thousand lives.* On the cessation of this terrible plague, in the year 1631, preparations were made for building the celebrated votive church of Santa Maria della Salute, at the entrance of the Canale Grande; and, in the meantime, a grand Mass of Thanksgiving was offered, on November 28, in the Cathedral of S. Mark, the music for the function being composed, as usual, by Monteverde. Magnificent effects are said to have been produced in the "Gloria" and "Credo" of this new Mass, by the introduction of trombones (trombe squarciate). The composer probably found it impossible, at this period, to exclude the dramatic element from any of his compositions.

It is easy to imagine the gloom that this frightful visitation must have cast over all classes of society, and the solemn feelings it must have awakened in the minds of thoughtful men. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that, in 1633, Monteverde was admitted to the priesthood. A letter is still extant in which, speaking of an insult which had been offered to him in the Piazza di San Marco, by a singer named Domenico Aldegati, he complains of the affront, "not," to use his own words, "as Claudio Monteverde, Priest (for, as such, I pardon everything, and pray God to do the same), but as maestro di cappella."

We hear but little of Monteverde for some years after his admission to holy orders. But, during this period, the interests of Art were not suffered to languish. In the year 1637, the first regular Opera-house was opened for the public in Venice, near the Church of S. Cassiano, from which circumstance it was named Il Teatro di San Cassiano. The original impresarii—the first on record—were Benedetto Ferrari, the celebrated performer on the theorbo, and Francesco Manelli, the former of whom wrote the words, and the latter the music, of the Opera with which the new house opened, "L'Andromeda." The success of this speculation was complete. In the following year the same two authors produced a second work,

* We need scarcely say that the horrors of this pestilence were not confined to Venice. Its ravages in Milan are well described by Manzoni, in the "Promessi Sposi," on the authority of Tadino, Ripamonte, and other writers of the time.

"La Maga fulminata." In 1639, Ferrari wrote both the words and music of "L'Armida"; Manelli set to music Giulio Strozzi's "La Delia, ossia la Sposa del Sole"; Francesco Cavalli—Monteverde's most famous disciple—followed with "Le Nozze di Peleo e di Tetide"; and, to crown the triumphs of the "season," Monteverde himself reappeared upon the scene with a new work, called "L'Adone," founded upon a libretto prepared by Paolo Vendramino, and so well adapted to the public taste, that it was performed, continuously, from the autumn of this brilliant year to the Carnival of 1640.

Manelli's "La Delia, ossia la Sposa del Sole" was also performed, in 1637, at the inauguration of a second theatre, that of SS. Giovanni e Paolo; and a third Opera-house, Il Teatro di San Mosè, was opened in 1641 with a revival of Monteverde's first great work, "Arianna." The reappearance of this early piece, after its repose of thirty-four years' duration, seems to have excited the venerable composer, now seventy-three years old, to almost superhuman exertion; for in this same year (1641) he produced two new Operas, "Le Nozze di Enea con Lavinia," and "Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria," both written for him by Giacomo Badoaro, and both so successful, that he was tempted, in 1642, to set to music Gianfrancesco Businello's "L'Incoronazione di Poppea." This was the last great effort of his genius. He survived its production but a very short time. Moved, in his old age, by an irresistible desire to see once more the scenes among which his youth had been passed, he left his happy home for a time, intending to visit some of his oldest and most valued friends; but, while thus engaged, he was seized with a serious illness, and, feeling his powers rapidly failing, returned with all haste to Venice, where he died, respected by all who knew him, in the year 1643. His obsequies were celebrated with great solemnity in the Ducal Chapel. The music sung on this occasion was directed by Giovanni Rovetta, the vice-maestro, who eventually succeeded him in his office; but a second "Requiem" was sung soon afterwards, under the direction of his pupil, Giambattista Marinoni (detto Giove), in the Chiesa dei Frari, where his remains were entombed in a chapel on the Gospel side of the Choir, beneath a celebrated altar-piece, the joint production of Luigi Vivarini and Marco Basaiti. No name is mentioned on the stone covering of the vault, which, however, still remains, bearing the general inscription—

"CADAVERIBUS INSUBRIUM HUJUSCE COLLEGII SARCOPHAGUS DICATUS MDXX. CONSULE JO. BAPT. CUCHETTO INSTAURATUS ANNO DOM. MDVIIC."

A fairly good portrait of Monteverde is given by Francesco Caffi, in the first volume of his "Storia della Musica Sacra" (Venice, 1854). But the primary authority upon which all later reproductions rest is that engraved by D. Matteo Caburletto, in his "Laconismo delle alte qualità de Claudio Monteverde," a memoir which would have been exceedingly valuable had its writer—one of Monteverde's most intimate friends—confined himself to sober history instead of indulging in the high-flown panegyrics which provoke Ambros to exclaim against "the unusual title of this by no means 'laconic' production."

Monteverde's printed works are not numerous. Besides the "Canzonets for Three Voices," already mentioned as having been published in 1584, he has left us eight books of Madrigals, nearly all of which have been several times reprinted. Of these, the first appeared at Venice in 1587, the second in 1593, the third in 1594, the fourth in 1597, and the fifth in 1599. These are all for five voices. The sixth book, published in 1614, is chiefly for five voices also, but contains "Un dialogo a sette." The seventh book, for one, two, three, four, and six voices, was printed in 1619. The eighth book, consisting of "Madrigali guerrieri e amorosi," and containing also "Il Combattimento di Tancredi e Clorinda," closed the series in 1638. There are also a few stray Madrigals contained in other collections; and in 1607 the composer's brother, Giulio Cesare Monteverde, edited a volume of "Scherzi musicali a tre voci," in which he reprinted the letter, "Agli studiosi lettori," already mentioned.

Three volumes only of Church music remain to us. A "Missa senis vocibus, et Vesperæ, &c." (Venice, 1610); a more important work, entitled "Selva morale e spirituale nella quale si trova Messe, Salmi, Hymni Magnificat, Motetti, Salve Regina, e Lamento; a 1 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 voci con violini" (Venice, 1623); and a posthumous volume, printed in 1650, and entitled "Messe à quattro voci e Salmi a 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 voci concertati con le Lit. dell B.V."

The "Lamento" mentioned in the title of "Selva morale e spirituale" is the "Lament of Ariadne," shown in example 10, converted, by the adaptation of new words, into a "Pianto della Madonna" and by no means improved by the change. We have already said that this is the only portion of "Arianna" now remaining to us. "Orfeo" was published, complete, in 1609, and reissued in 1615. The "Combattimento," published in the "Eighth Book of Madrigals," is the only other dramatic work in print; but, by a most fortunate accident, the entire score of "Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria" has been preserved in MS. In the year 1641 Monteverde sent a copy of the second edition of his "Selva morale" to the Empress Eleonora, at Vienna, and accompanied the gift by a complete copy of his new Opera (then just produced), not in his own handwriting, but enriched by annotations which are believed to have been added by himself. This book was highly prized by the Emperor Leopold I., whose portrait is impressed in gold upon the binding; but it long remained forgotten in the imperial library, where it was at length discovered by the indefatigable Ambros, who transcribed it entire, "in order," as he says, "that there might be a second copy in the world."

It is much to be regretted that so many of Monteverde's MSS. have either been destroyed or hidden away in corners whence it seems all but impossible to disinter them. The number of his compositions for the Cathedral of S. Mark is known to have been prodigious; but, thanks to conflagrations in times past, and depredations of later date, none of them now remain. An inventory, dated 1720, mentions one Mass only, and that has since disappeared. A few works may be found in the libraries of some Italian cathedrals, but Caffi believes that a far larger collection of such treasures is accumulated at Breslau, to which city vast numbers of invaluable MSS. were removed on the dissolution of some of the German monasteries. In connection with this subject Fétis tells a curious story, to the effect that Gaspar Monge, the well-known mathematician and enthusiastic musical amateur, caused copies to be made from a large collection of Monteverde's Church Music, preserved in the library at S. Mark's; that he intrusted them, for transmission to Paris, to the care of the celebrated violinist, Rodolph Kreutzer, who utterly neglected his charge; and that, when the French army was compelled to retreat from Venice, the allies took possession of the cases in which they were packed, and carried them away to England. Can they be still in existence?

In estimating Monteverde's influence upon the music of the seventeenth century, we must not omit to take into consideration the condition of Art before he began to study it. It is impossible to believe that the polyphonic schools could have been brought to a higher state of perfection than that in which they were left by Palestrina, Vittoria, Luca Marenzio, and their great contemporaries. Nor can we, in the face of all historic experience, believe it possible that they could have remained stationary in that perfect condition for any length of time. In every branch of Art—it is a sad, but inexorable law!—when progress ceases, decadence is inevitable. The signs of such decadence were palpable enough, before the sixteenth century had passed away. Monteverde's own Church compositions and madrigals were evidences of its only too rapid approach. Had he written these alone, instead of honouring him as an inventor it would have been our duty to join Artusi in denouncing him as the corrupter of an excellent and beautiful thing. Even as it is, we cannot but deplore the fatality—inevitable though it was—which prevented both himself and his disciples from seeing more clearly the true tendency of the principles he was inculcating. Happy would it have been if he could have started on a confessedly new basis, left the lovers of the old school to carry out their own traditions in their own way, and confined his attention exclusively to the cultivation of dramatic art—if he could have built his own beautiful temple without destroying the grand old Gothic fane on the site of which he sought to raise it. It was not until the last stone of that fane had been cleared away that the full beauty of the new structure was manifested. Each style was beautiful—nay, perfect—in itself; but the mixture of the two was as incongruous as the intrusion of Roubilliac into Westminster Abbey. It was impossible that he should either have foreseen this, or have fully comprehended the significance of his own discoveries. Let us, then, forget the past, and give him due thanks for the good things he has bequeathed to us—the free style, the passionate dissonances without which that style would lose its most powerful means of expression, dramatic truth, symmetrical form, a clear perception of the force of rhythm, and a system of instrumentation which forms the basis of the latest "novelties" of the present day. Unless we assume that, if he had not invented these things, some one else would have done so—which is a very unfair assumption indeed—it is clear that, without Monteverde, we could have had no Handel, no Bach, no Haydn, no Mozart, and no Beethoven.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (continued from page 121).

This chapter will be of a desultory nature, inasmuch as, unlike those lately devoted to "Elijah" and Mendelssohn's Berlin engagement, it cannot have running through it a continuous theme. But the fragments in our master's letters—as by this time the least interested reader very well knows—ought not to be neglected. Indeed, they often throw fuller light upon his character than more elaborated utterances. The present will be a chapter of fragments.

In April, 1841, an overture, "Hero and Leander," by Julius Rietz, was performed at Leipzig under Mendelssohn's direction, and, after his usual kindly fashion, the greater composer wrote to the lesser in terms of mingled felicitation and criticism. We may pass the compliments, and confine ourselves to the strictures, which are of real worth, and remarkable as applied not only to Rietz but to Mendelssohn himself: "I perceive a certain spirit, especially in the overture, which I myself know only too well, for in my opinion it caused my 'Reformation Symphony' to fail, but which can surely and infallibly be banished by assiduous work of various kinds. Just as the French, by conjuring tricks and overwrought sentiment, endeavour to make their style harrowing and exciting, so I believe it possible, through a natural repugnance to this style, to fall into the other extreme, and so greatly to dread all that is piquant or sensuous that at last the musical idea does not remain sufficiently bold or interesting—that instead of a tumour there is a wasting away. It is the contrast between the Jesuit churches and their thousand glittering objects, and the Calvinists, with their four white walls. True piety may exist in both, but the right path lies between the two. . . . The fundamental thoughts in your Overture and my 'Reformation Symphony' (both having, in my opinion, similar qualities) are more interesting from what they indicate than actually interesting in themselves. Of course I do not plead for the latter quality alone (as that would lead us to the French), nor for the first alone either; both must be united and blended. The most important point is to give to a theme, or anything of the kind, a real musical interest. This you well understand in your instrumentation, and I should like to see you steer boldly in that direction in your next works, without, however, injuring, by the greater finish and sharpness of your musical thoughts, your excellent foundation, or your masterly and admirably carried out details of instrumentation, &c." This is obviously a plea for the spirit as against the mere form of musical composition, and reveals the reason why the "Reformation Symphony," with its prevailing scholasticism, did not satisfy its fastidious author, and was so long withheld from public notice. Since Mendelssohn's day, unfortunately, we have gone to the other extreme; and if certain composers were now to lock up their works on the plea that they too much resemble, not a Calvinistic chapel, but a Jesuit church, art would certainly not be a loser, as it was by the withholding of the "Reformation."

It must already have been observed that Mendelssohn's attitude towards musical critics was not precisely that of a friend. One so sensitive could hardly have taken up such a position, and it is clear that, while abstaining from positive resentment, he found relief in now and then sending an arrow obliquely in the direction of the critical camp. Writing to David from Berlin, in October, 1841, à propos to "Antigone," the master said: "If it were not so difficult here to come to any kind of judgment about a work! There are, for the most part, only shameless flatterers, or equally shameless critics to be met with, and there is nothing to be done with either, for both from the very first deprive us of all pleasure. As yet I have had only to do with admiration, but after the performance the learned will, no doubt, come forward and reveal to me how I must and should have composed, had I been a Berliner." It was, perhaps, hardly fair to assume the intended committal of an offence, and punish the not yet guilty with a sneer, but this aptly illustrates the general tone of the writer towards those who were professionally bound to treat him as a subject for dissection. Mendelssohn had, however, more good sense than to enter into any newspaper controversy, and he even declined offers on the part of others to take up the cudgels on his behalf. One such offer was made with reference to "Antigone," by Professor Dehn, of Berlin, and Mendelssohn thus replied: "Although I entirely agree with you that my choruses to 'Antigone' will furnish an opportunity for a number of unfair and malignant attacks, still I cannot meet these unpleasant probabilities by the means which you are so good as to propose to me. I have always made it an inviolable rule never to write myself in newspapers on any subject connected with music, nor either directly or indirectly to prompt any article to be written on my own compositions; and although I am well aware how often this must be both a temporary and sensible disadvantage, still I cannot deviate from a resolution which I have strictly followed out under all circumstances." Mendelssohn's proud abstention from any interference with the natural course of his music after it had been once given to the world did not stop at a refusal to sanction newspaper advocacy. He declined to follow what seems then to have been the fashion in France, and conciliate the leading performers by means of presents. His "Antigone" was brought out by Julius Stern at the Odéon in 1844, and we gather that Stern suggested a substantial and personal compliment to the principal artists engaged. In answer Mendelssohn said: "This would be contrary to the fixed principles which I adopted at the beginning of my musical career—never in any way to mix up my personal position with my musical one; never to improve the latter by the influence of the former, nor in any manner to bribe public or private opinion with regard to me, or even to attempt to strengthen it. Precisely owing to the heartfelt gratitude I entertain towards all those who interest themselves in my music, it would be impossible for me to follow the fashion of giving presents, without embittering for the future the gratitude and joy emanating from it. And although this fashion may have been introduced by the greatest authorities, I must always remain true to myself and to what I deem to be right, and feel to be so: so you must excuse me for not complying with this practice. I trust that you will not be angry with me, but rather defend me against those who may attack me on this account. You will acknowledge that every man must fix certain rules by which he is to live and act, and therefore will not misconstrue my adhering to mine." It is worthy of observation that nearly all the great composers have acted with regard to their works in the spirit of Mendelssohn, and that it was reserved for Richard Wagner to show how a man can not only create musical works, but act as leader of a pen and ink crusade on their behalf. The advantage of the innovation is not yet sufficiently obvious to warrant anybody in seeking to establish it as a custom.

Never weary of urging his friends to be true to themselves and their vocation, Mendelssohn wrote in January, 1842, to Eckert, who then resided in Paris, giving him some advice which cannot be too deeply pondered by those who have yet to discover that true music is not an affair of calculation but of inward impulse: "You have reached a standard that may in every relation well be called a mastership, which all musicians or friends to music must highly esteem, and beyond which nothing actually extrinsic (whether it be called erudition or recognition, facility and knowledge, honour and fame) is any longer worth striving for; but this is, in my opinion, just the time when true work first really begins. The question is then solely what is felt and experienced within a man's own breast, and uttered from the depths of his heart, be it grave or gay, bitter or sweet. Character and life are displayed here, and in order to prevent existence being dissipated and wasted when brilliant and happy, or depressed and destroyed when the reverse, there is but one safeguard—to work and go on working. So for you I have only one wish — that you may bring to light what exists within you, in your nature and feelings, which none save yourself can know or possess. In your works go deeper and deeper into your inmost being, and let them bear this distinct stamp. Let criticism and intellect rule as much as you please in all outward questions and forms, but in all inner and original thought the heart alone and genuine feeling. So work, daily, hourly, and unremittingly; there you can never reach entire mastery or perfection; no man ever yet did, and therefore it is the highest vocation of life." In these words we have the loftiest possible conception of the creative musician, who appears to us as coming out of himself only to master the forms of art, and then retiring whither none can follow, into the depths of his own nature, and speaking thence direct to the universal soul.

As to the musician's utterances, Mendelssohn's reply to a correspondent who asked the meaning of some of the "Lieder ohne Worte" may well be introduced here. It is one of the most valuable declarations upon a topic often debated that the literature of our art contains, and expresses in small compass that which might be amplified to volumes. In effect Mendelssohn propounds this thesis: "Music is more definite than words, and to seek to explain its meaning in words is really to obscure it." Every sentence in the following extract should be well weighed: "There is so much talk about music, and yet so little really said. For my part, I believe that words do not suffice for such a purpose; and if I found that they did suffice, then I certainly would compose no more music. People often complain that music is so ambiguous that what they are to think about it always seems so doubtful, whereas every one understands words. With me it is exactly the reverse, not merely with regard to entire sentences, but also to individual words; these, too, seem to me so ambiguous, so vague, so unintelligible when compared with genuine music, which fills the soul with a thousand things better than words. What any music I love expresses to me is not thought too indefinite to be put into words, but, on the contrary, too definite. I find in all attempts to put such thoughts into words something commendable, but there is yet something unsatisfactory in them all; and so it is with yours. This, however, is not your fault, but that of the words, which do not enable you to do better. If you ask me what my idea was, I say just the song as it stands; and if I had in my mind a definite term or terms with regard to one or more of these songs, I should not like to disclose them to any one, because the words of one person assume a totally different meaning in the mind of another person—because the music of the song alone can awaken the same ideas and the same feelings in one mind as in another — a feeling which is not, however, expressed by the same words. Resignation, melancholy, the praise of God, a hunting song—one person does not form the same conception from these that another does. Resignation is to the one what melancholy is to the other; the third can form no lively idea of either. To any man who is by nature a keen sportsman, a hunting song and the praise of God would come pretty much to the same thing; and to such a one the sound of the hunting horn would really and truly be the praise of God, whereas we hear nothing in it but a mere hunting song, and if we were to discuss it ever so often with him we should get no further. Words have many meanings, but music we can all understand correctly. Will you allow this to serve as an answer to your question? At all events it is the only one I can give, although these, too, are nothing after all but ambiguous words." We have here the case very acutely and, as it seems to us, very conclusively put. Here, moreover, we see the sufficient reasons why Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte" were given to the world without the distinctive appellations which some people of weak musical perceptiveness are fond of inventing. The master shows clearly enough that to call one piece "Melancholy" or another "Resignation" is certainly to limit and probably to distort its meaning, since the same word does not of necessity imply the same thing to different minds. Music is freer and more potent, therefore, when dissociated from any attempt at a verbal definition of the feelings it is meant to excite, and, by a parity of reasoning, that which we call programme music, or music written to illustrate incident and emotion recognised by verbal description, occupies an inferior rank.

Turning from this grave subject, we meet with a letter beautifully suggestive of Mendelssohn's true kindness of heart. It is addressed to Simrock, the Bonn publisher, on behalf of a brother composer, indicated in the published correspondence by the initial X. We know now, for the person most concerned has told us, that X really stands for Ferdinand Hiller, who, at this time (1842), had not the public ear to the extent which, in Mendelssohn's opinion, he deserved. Hiller has reprinted the letter in his book on Mendelssohn, and truly says that "it displays a wonderful amount of tender consideration and loving sympathy." No one can peruse it without seeing the writer in a beautiful light, and enjoying a look into the depths of a most amiable soul. We give the more noteworthy passages: "During my stay here I heard by chance that my friend and colleague in art, Herr Hiller (X), had written to you about the publication of some new works, but hitherto had received no answer. Now, both in the interest of art as well as in that of my friend, I should indeed be very glad if the answer were to prove favourable; and as I flatter myself that you place some value on my opinion and my wish, it occurred to me to write to you myself on the subject, and to beg of you, if you possibly can, to make some of my friend's works known to the general public. My wish for the secrecy which I wish you to observe towards every one and under all circumstances is owing to this—that I feel certain Herr Hiller would be frantic if he had the most remote idea that I had taken such a step on his behalf. I know that nothing would be more intolerable to him than not to stand absolutely on his own ground, and therefore he never must know of this letter. On the other hand, it is the positive duty of one artist towards another to assist as much as possible in overcoming difficulties and annoyances, and to contribute as far as lies in his power to the attainment of his aims when such aims are noble and in a good cause, and both are so to the highest degree in this case. I therefore beg you to publish some of his new compositions, and above all, if possible, to enter into a more permanent connection with him." Then follow some outspoken observations on the duty of a publisher to place "more faith in true worth than in any chance result," after which Mendelssohn continues: "Forgive the liberty I have taken, and, if possible, comply with my wish. So far as I have heard, there is no pretension to any considerable sum for these works, but a very strong desire that they may be generally circulated and made known, and that the correspondence should be carried on in a friendly spirit. If you will or can enter into the affair, I rely on your sacred silence as to my interference, my name, and my request. If I shortly hear from my friend that you have written to him in a kind manner, and have agreed to assist him in making the public familiar with his songs and pianoforte works, how heartily shall I then rejoice! . . . I mean to set to work shortly, and to overwhelm you with music-paper (as soon as it is well-filled) and to request in my own name what I now so urgently and anxiously entreat in that of my friend." It is pleasant to know that this effort to "do good by stealth" succeeded and bore fruit. Simrock behaved most graciously in the matter, and Mendelssohn's almost boyish delight shines through every word of the note he sent in acknowledgment: "I must confess that I had not expected such ready courtesy and satisfactory compliance with my letter of solicitation. I now doubly rejoice in having taken a step which a feeling of false shame and that odious worldly maxim 'don't interfere in the affairs of others,' which occurred to me while writing, nearly deterred me from carrying out. Your conduct, as displayed in your letter of yesterday, has confirmed me more than ever in what I esteem to be good and right; so I intend to lay aside for ever the (so-called) highly prized worldly wisdom, and henceforth to pursue a straightforward course, according to my own first impulse and feeling: if it fail a hundred times still one such success is ample compensation." Who does not feel drawn to Mendelssohn by his noble and practical sympathy with a struggling brother, and by his unaffected delight at the result obtained? Another illustration of this part of Mendelssohn's character is to hand in the letters of the same period. The autumn of 1842 saw Mendelssohn again in Switzerland, going over some part of the route traversed by him in 1831. Passing through the Unterwalden, he sought out his old guide, and found him. "We mutually recognised each other, to our great joy," he writes to his mother. "He is now the landlord of the 'Crown' in Meiringen. Dearest mother, recommend the man and his house to all your correspondents. I am quite determined to write to London and ask Murray to praise the 'Crown' in Meiringen in his next red Guide Book to Switzerland. He can do so with a clear conscience. Michael has a good house, an extremely pretty wife, and five fine children, for whom I bought a few little trifles and some toy soldiers in Unterseen, and thus we had a happy meeting after a lapse of eleven years. He brought me the words of the song in G major he sang at that time, the melody of which I had retained, but always plagued myself in vain about the verses. When I told him that we wished to go to the Grimsel he got very red, and said, 'Then I must go too—I must go!' so he intrusted the public room (which is his department) to the care of a friend, and was ready next morning with his mountain staff and blouse, and led the horses past some awkward places, and the ladies past the most dangerous ones, and us too, when it was possible to cut off the distance by footpaths; and the people in Guttanen laughed at seeing him again. 'It is only for a little while,' said he; and a man who was making hay called out to him, 'Oho, Michael, so you can't give up being a guide yet!' He confided to me that it did sometimes seem hard to be obliged to do so, and if he did not think of his wife and children, who knows what might happen? We separated on the Grimsel. This was a pleasant episode." And pleasant it is to us who read Mendelssohn's simple yet graphic description. Our master did not forget his humble friend when far away from him. A few months later he wrote to Klingemann in London, and said: "A request occurs to me which I long ago intended to have made to you. In Switzerland I saw my former guide, Michael, whom on my previous mountain expeditions I always found to be an excellent, honest, obliging fellow, and on this occasion I met with him again, married to a charming, pretty woman. He has children, and is no longer a guide, but established as landlord of the 'Krone.' . . . It is a most genuine Swiss village inn taken in its best sense. Now Michael's greatest wish is to be named among the inns at Meiringen in the new edition of Murray's 'Switzerland,' and I promised to endeavour to effect this for him. Is it in your power to get this done? . . . Michael said that the author of the handbook had been there, and was very much fêté by the other landlords. His means did not admit of this; still he would give a good round sum of money if he would only mention him. I was indignant and said, 'Without money, or not at all.' But I thought of many musical newspapers and composers, so I did not lecture him much on the subject, for fear that he might one day hear something of the same sort from one of my colleagues and take his revenge. There is now a general complaint that the large town hotels have superseded the smaller, comfortable, genuine Swiss inns. This is one of the latter sort, so Murray must really recommend it. Pray do what you can about this, and tell me if you succeed. Forgive my troubling you, the secretary of an embassy, with such things, but if you knew Michael you would like him, I am sure." Genuine kindliness of this sort resembles good wine, and needs no bush. Moreover, to add a word would be to spoil the effect of the incident as described by Mendelssohn himself.

Now let Mendelssohn stand before us as a conservator of the works of his fellow masters—even of that in them which might be amended. We have before seen him in this capacity, and it seems as though advancing years only increased the reverence in his nature and heightened his horror of the vandalism which would, in the name of improvement, lay hands upon sacred things. Writing to Simrock about Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte," he says: "I should like to know whether you are disposed to allow the original correct text to be substituted in your plates of this opera, and some proofs to be taken. It appears to me almost a positive duty that such a work should descend to posterity in its unvitiated form. We, indeed, all know perfectly well, for instance, the aria beginning "Dies Bildniss ist bezaubernd schön," but if, in the course of a few years, the younger musicians always see it written, "So reizend hold, so zaub'risch schön," they will acquire a false idea of Mozart's thoughts; and I go so far as to assert that even the most undeniably bad passages in such a text deserve to be retained, as Mozart composed music for them, and they have thus become household words all through Germany. If improvements are to be proposed it is all very well, but they ought to stand side by side with the original words; in no case should these words be entirely banished, otherwise fidelity towards the great master is not properly observed. . . . If you resolve to alter your plates then I shall be the first, but certainly not the last, of your customers to thank you for it." Wholesome words these at a time when men are starting up on every hand to tell us what the masters might, could, should, or would have written under this, that, and the other condition, and proposing to conform the text to such imaginings. The passage just quoted is, however, as regards Mendelssohn himself, only an outcome of the severe artistic morality which shines in many letters, above all in one written to Herr Otten, of Hamburg, who had drawn a flattering comparison between our master's music and the fashionable effusions of the day: "I believe that this (the fashionable) mode will soon pass away, even without any counter-influences. To be sure, a new one is certain to start up, but just on this account it seems to me best to pursue one's own path steadily, and especially to guard against an evil custom of the day, which is not included in those you name, but which also does infinite harm—squandering and frittering away talents for the sake of outward show. This is a reproach which I might make to most of our present artists, and to myself also more than I could wish. I have no great inclination, therefore, to extend my travels, but rather to restrict them, in order to strive with greater earnestness for my own improvement instead of the good opinion of others." As Mendelssohn appears in this extract, so we may leave him for a month, carrying with us till we meet the master again a remembrance of true nobility, perfect uprightness, and gentleness like the gentleness of a little child.

MR. SIMS REEVES'S FAREWELL.

It is not alone the unexpected which startles us—indeed, if proverbial philosophy may be trusted, the unexpected should never astonish, since it is always happening. Be this as it may, there are some events which we know will take place in the order of nature, and yet they come upon us as a surprise. Among them, certainly, is the retirement of a great and favourite artist. To such an one belongs the proud privilege of weaving himself, as it were, into the texture of the lives of all who sympathise with his art. Unconsciously, perhaps, but effectively, he is accepted as an element in the constitution of existence, and, although our moments of reflection show that a time of separation must come, the rule is to act and feel as though it never would. This may especially be said of musical artists in general, and of vocalists in particular. Unlike the painter, sculptor, or poet, who works in the seclusion of the atelier or study, and can speak to the world without coming beyond the shadow of his home, musical artists are personally known. They are not names only, but living men and women whom the public can approach, and between whom and the public often arises a feeling of friendship, although never a word may have been exchanged. The vocalist in this respect has an advantage over the instrumental performer. The one is only seen, of the other we behold the form and hear the voice. The one approaches us in person through the channel of but a single sense; the other has a double road of communication, and is so much the more near when discharging the functions of his art. Hence the firm, strong hold which great vocalists have at all times taken of the public; hence the interest their movements excite, and the feeling called forth when it is decided that the bond uniting them to their admirers must be severed. Such a decision has been arrived at by the famous singer whose name is at the head of this article, and the authoritative announcement of it which we now make, albeit not surprising, will yet surprise through an instinctive objection to anticipate it. Mr. Sims Reeves has figured so long upon the lyric stage and concert platform, and has occupied so large a space in public regard, that only with difficulty can we accommodate ourselves to the idea of a time when the place that now knows him will know him not, and when the voice always associated with our conception of the best in vocal art will be silent. Out of this regret inevitably arises, and not alone selfish regret. We may, and must, be sorry for the extinction of a shining light in the firmament of music. But we are bound to sympathise also with the emotion of every man who reaches the conclusion that his life's work is done, and that for him there can be no more ambition, achievement, and reward. Not without a pang do those who have lived in the sight, and upon the favour of the public, withdraw into obscurity. Hence the feeling called forth by Mr. Reeves's retirement will have himself for an object as much as our own selves and the art that loses an illustrious exponent.

It is not our present purpose to discuss the career, estimate the qualities, and sum up the life-work of Mr. Sims Reeves. The time for that task has yet to come, and before it arrives Mr. Reeves may add no inconsiderable or unimportant chapter to his history. But we do wish to place before the public such circumstances connected with the closing episode in the artist's public life as may not only gratify curiosity, but excite a determination to make it, in point of success, worthy of all that has gone before. We hardly need to try and induce amateurs everywhere to "see the last" of Sims Reeves. That they will do so of their own accord is a foregone conclusion, and, as though justly reckoning upon this, Mr. Reeves proposes to make his final campaign both lengthy and comprehensive. His retirement will be a deliberate and dignified proceeding, so arranged as that all may take farewell under conditions favourable to after reminiscence of his great and varied achievements. No one, we suspect, will charge the famous tenor with overweening vanity on this account. A man cannot live for more than a generation amid the applause of his fellows without perceiving that he is something in their eyes, and that by acting upon the perception, in such a matter as the present, he best consults their wishes. If, then, Mr. Reeves proposes to begin his farewell performances next autumn, and close them at the end of 1882, the fact may be accepted as evidence of sympathy and goodwill which two years of leavetaking cannot exhaust.

Mr. Reeves will, we understand, appeal in the first instance to his Irish friends, and make a tour through the sister island during the coming autumn. He may expect the traditional "hundred thousand welcomes" of a warm-hearted people, for, though the great artist has not been able to visit them much of late, his name and fame are cherished with true Celtic fervour. Presumably he will appear in Ireland both on the stage and platform, but, in any case, he purposes to be back in London to fulfil a series of engagements through the following winter and summer. In the autumn of 1881, Mr. Reeves will commence the round of Great Britain, making, as is easy to foresee, a triumphal progress from place to place, and being everywhere hailed with a mixture of pleasure and sorrow. At the close of this tour he returns to London, for the purpose of appearing, during the remainder of 1882, both in opera and oratorio. With admirable fitness, his farewell to the lyric stage is to be made in the part of Edgardo, ("Lucia")—one associated with the greatest triumphs of his early days. But even more interesting, perhaps, than Mr. Reeves's performances in opera will be his rendering, for the last time, of the sacred airs with which his name is so brilliantly associated. In view of all this, every amateur will pray that the great tenor may have health and strength to carry out his purpose. The work is heavy, and the circumstances are exciting, but given bodily vigour, it will be brought, no doubt, to a triumphant close, and enable those who may chronicle the ending to write with perfect truth, "Finis coronat opus."

"After the fathers come up the children." Even as, years ago, a Mr. Reeves studied singing in Italy, and returned hither to reach fame by "leaps and bounds," so now another Mr. Reeves is studying singing in Italy, hoping for like reward. Both gentlemen—father and son—will go together through the closing tours of the elder; and in Mr. Herbert Reeves, if report may be trusted, Mr. Sims Reeves will leave to his admirers a fitting artistic legacy. Should the son worthily take up and wear the mantle of the father, a famous name will have been rescued from becoming only a memory, and we may regard him who made it famous as, after a double manner, living on in the person of his child.

COPYRIGHT IN MUSIC.

The question of "copyright" or the "right of copy," or briefly "copy," as it was formerly styled, has attracted considerable attention since the recent report of a Royal Commission on the subject. It is pretty well known that the said Commission arrived at the conclusion that copyright should be continued to be treated as a "proprietary right."

To the man of business it appears singular that a similar decision should need reaffirming, or that proprietary rights should have ever been questioned even in literary or artistic productions. The trader himself claims protection in regard to a species of property so indefinite as a trade mark. Yet if a manufacturer places on his fabrics a symbol not his own, he is morally guilty only of the minor sin of plagiarism; a form of imposition treated in law as a misdemeanour, and in extreme cases as forgery. Whereas when a publisher reproduces without authority a literary work, it is not merely a question of misrepresentation in respect to the manufacture of the product, but of an absolute and direct appropriation of the product, consisting not in the materials, but in the creative labour, embodied or symbolised in printer's type.

On that account this subject is nearly always treated purely from the author's point of view. The mercantile question of the cost of printing and publishing is not an element in the case. The publisher who acquires proprietary rights only appears as the representative of the author. Hence the difficulty in one sense, because it is impossible to clearly appraise the money value of the author's labour. In the eyes of the law one book or one piece of music is as good as another. On the other hand, although a manuscript or mere private letter is the property of the writer, the proprietary right is publicly established by the act of printing and publishing. The tangible and portable book or piece of music is recognised by the law as vicariously representing an incorporeal property, or a general and indefinable right residing in the author.

In that recognition the law follows the same process of reasoning it adopts in reference to the pilfering of a mercantile bill or a bank-note, intrinsically worthless beyond the trifling cost of paper and printing. In any case it is in some sense property; but the law clearly recognises in the formal inscription and at a specified period something beyond the intrinsic value, and without reference to the ultimate security of a particular bank or commercial firm. The law here, as in many other cases, sets us the example of taking up a subject in the stage in which at a certain period it practically exists; independently of abstract questions that have an origin antecedent to human law, and even to society in its more complex forms.

It may be perfectly true, as Mr. Matthew Arnold reminds us when writing lately on this same subject, that "if we go down into our own minds and deal quite freely with our own consciousness we shall find that we have no natural rights at all." Indeed, as a matter of fact, we have no natural right even to live. Fortunately, and per contra, no one has a natural right to deprive us of life. Being here, we have firstly to make the conditions of existence possible, then bearable, and finally, as society advances, agreeable; or as agreeable as we can under the circumstances. As Mr. Arnold would tell us, if we have no natural rights we have "natural instincts"; and to prevent others interfering with the gratification of our instincts, and particularly with the gratification of the "instinct to possess," is the beginning of law.

Adding precedent to precedent, and volume to volume of statutes, we arrive at last at a certain precision in ascertaining the degree to which we can interfere with impunity, even with the artificial or conventional rights of other people. In regard to copyright, although there are various subtle considerations not yet determined or duly provided for by the statutes in force, there are a few enactments so plain that it is astonishing how frequently, and in some instances how innocently, they are violated.

It is a misfortune inherent in the nature of the whole question that the several arts the law of copyright is intended to protect differ in many essentials. It is impossible to multiply pictures, except by the hand of the original artist, in the same sense we multiply copies of books or music. In one clause of an Act we may combine dramatic pieces and pieces of music; yet the performance of a drama without remuneration to the author may to him be a hardship; whereas the performance of a song in public, although the law prohibits it without permission, is a positive benefit to the composer, and in fact an advertisement for which unhappily he is sometimes weak enough to pay. Even the opera composer is better situated in that respect than the dramatist, because the composer or the publisher who represents him can sell the opera in fractions or excerpts.

The law on these subjects suffers not only from the indifference of legislators to certain branches of the question, but from the proverbial clannishness and economic illiberality of the literary or artistic mind itself. What is wanted in this country is a Minister of Fine Arts, or some power above "specialism," and who, in addition to his own knowledge, could acquire technical information with greater ease than that cumbrous institution known as a "Royal Commission," whose conclusions end in compromise between the particular interest and the general interest, and are seldom even attended to for years after it makes its report, if they are ever attended to at all.

In some arts, and in music above all, it is next to impossible, in the interests of the general public, to cover by enactment the various methods of evading the law of copyright without descending into frivolous detail. To remedy that difficulty the law has very properly made certain plain cases so comprehensive in the interests of the author that the public have to trust to his common sense as a protection against vexatious litigation. The forbearance of the author is liable to abuse, and occasionally it is worth the while of an author or publisher to threaten or commence an action, to persuade people into an understanding of the letter of the law. A curious case of the kind occurred some thirty years ago, and is reported in "The Musical Times" of June, 1852. The well-known publisher of that date, Mr. Novello, brought a friendly action against Mr. William Sudlow, who was then secretary of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society. The action was simply to try a point of law. The Society had included in the programme of one of its concerts a part-song called "The Wreath," by Benedict, which had appeared in "Novello's Part-Song Book," and was the property of Mr. Novello. Nothing could seem more natural than that Mr. Sudlow, in the exercise of his duties, should get the parts for his chorus cheaply lithographed, instead of going to the expense of purchasing so many copies of the book. Mr. Novello, however, made a request that the lithographed copies should be sent to him, and that Mr. Sudlow should purchase the copyright edition of the work. The secretary of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society replied, expressing his surprise at the demand, as he had never "sold any of the copies, or hired any out." An action ensued, and it was contended on the part of the defendants that if the plaintiff's argument were to prevail, it would extend to give an action in the minutest case, "for instance, of copying out a piece of music for a pupil to play or the like, or by a young lady for her music-book." Such trifling pleas had, however, no influence with the Court at Westminster. The Lord Chief Justice (Sir John Jervis), Sir Cresswell Cresswell, Sir Edward Vaughan Williams, and Sir T. Noon Talfourd, before whom the case was tried, ruled that "the multiplication of the songs for gratuitous distribution" was an infringement of the Copyright Act; and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

Copyright is defined in the Act to mean "the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word applied."

Even making a single copy with the pen is illegal; although, as we have already intimated, proprietors do not generally speaking defend their rights when invaded in that way. But, little by little, when men find they can make a single copy with impunity they will make two, or a dozen, or two hundred; and when, as in the present day, all manner of scientific and mechanical appliances may be devoted to the multiplication of copies of printed music, much amateur and professional labour in new arts of printing that begins harmlessly, and proceeds innocently, may end sooner or later in a deliberate system of plunder. Many excellent and worthy people who may think the end justifies the means, or that devotional songs are barely to be ranked as human property, will benevolently recommend to their friends this or that process of multiplying copies of hymns for congregational use. But they must be reminded that the law is only in a few limited and very clearly defined cases a respecter of purposes. These gentlemen can multiply copies of the music of Bach and Handel and Purcell by a "blue process," a green process, or any process they choose; and when such music fatigues the public they can do their own compositions and arrangements in blue; but the unauthorised multiplication, in any form, of copyright music is robbery, subject to penalties which authors in their own interests are determined to enforce.

THEATRES v. MUSIC-HALLS.

"Of late, the policy of placing the theatres so entirely under the control of the Lord Chamberlain and Justices has been disputed, especially as the increasing practice of introducing theatrical performances at public supper-rooms has led to some vexatious prosecutions at the instance of the licensees of regular theatres."

The foregoing quotation is from no frivolous and irresponsible newspaper, but from a serious-minded Scottish encyclopædia. An illustration of the abuse referred to has occurred within the past month, in the summons taken out against Mr. Villiers, of the Canterbury Music-hall, for performing stage plays contrary to the 6th and 7th Vict., cap. 68. The piece in question is a ballet entitled the "Peri of Peru," and from the description given is no doubt what is called a "ballet of action," as distinguished from the "divertissement" or ordinary ballet, in which the dancing is the sole attraction. In the ordinary ballet there is incidental pantomime, but not sufficient to give it the character of a dramatic representation, even in a general and artistic sense, independently of the legal sense as interpreted by any particular municipal regulation. In the "ballet of action" the scenery, action, and pantomime combine in the development of a dramatic plot, or "argument" as it is technically described. Mr. Chance, the magistrate before whom the case was brought at the Lambeth Police-court, said that since the first hearing of the case he had been to the Canterbury Hall to see the "Peri of Peru," and he decided that what we have just described as a "ballet of action" was a "stage-play" within the meaning of the Act. It had been ruled on other occasions by the Courts that a stage-play must contain dialogue or, as they put it, "dualogue or dramatic performance by two persons." Whether the conjunction "or" is intended to connect or separate "dualogue" and "dramatic performance" is one of those mysteries which have contributed so much to the profit of lawyers and so little to the credit of the law. Mr. Chance, who appeared to be moved by doubts as to his own decision from at least an artistic point of view, or by disgust at the whole proceedings, was pleased to impose on Mr. Villiers only a nominal penalty of 40s., and declined to allow costs.

It was stated that this decision would be appealed against, and we may have yet one more fruitless discussion, in a court of law, as to what constitutes a "stage-play"; and for no earthly reason except the maintenance of an antiquated monopoly in favour of the lessees of theatres—a monopoly that the very lessee who instituted the recent proceedings at the Lambeth Police-court has publicly confessed is no benefit to him, whilst any rational person can understand that unnecessary restrictions imposed on the music-halls or other places of amusement only tend to lower the tone of the entertainments provided, and naturally lower the public taste. The ballet of action, for which the first composers have written some of their best music, is a poetic and beautiful entertainment, and will probably before long be revived; but it is suited only to a large stage. The smaller music-halls, if fairly treated, should be the nurseries of English light dramatic composition, and afford to our young composers, who are not necessarily all of them Beethovens, the opportunities that in the larger theatres are simply impossible. Trying their wings in the one-act operetta they would, in common with their literary collaborators, gradually abolish the idiocies and inanities of the London music-hall.

This question is politically part of a much larger one, extending from the licensing of a beershop to the patent laws—the greatest scandal of all. The whole licensing system now in force is condemned in public and private. In the euphemistic language of the editors, or, as we ought to say now, the managers of leading newspapers, the question has descended into the arena of "practical politics," or it is "ripe for legislation," meaning that the abuse has become so glaring that not even the busy and dull-sighted British public can be further cajoled.

We are glad to find that the many outspoken remarks of the press respecting the necessity of increased activity in the selection of music for the Festivals have at length been productive of the most beneficial results. At the Gloucester Festival, which commences on September 7, in addition to the Oratorios "Elijah," "St. Paul," and the "Messiah," Beethoven's Mass in D will be given, an attraction which should draw all true music-lovers to the Cathedral, the surroundings of which (as we have often indicated) are so thoroughly in accordance with a work of such sublimity. Spohr's "Last Judgment," Mozart's "Requiem," and Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" will also be performed; and an important feature in the programme will be specimens from the writings of the old Italian composers, viz., Palestrina's "Stabat Mater," and Leo's "Dixit Dominus." As a proof that English composers are not neglected, we may mention that negotiations have been opened with Dr. Stainer for the production of a new sacred work, but unfortunately his numerous engagements render it doubtful whether he will have time to complete it. Other native writers will however be represented, for two new Cantatas have been secured, one by Mr. C. H. Hubert Parry, and the other, called "Christmas Day," by Mr. Henry Holmes. The usual secular Concerts will be given on the evenings of Tuesday and Thursday—Wednesday evening being devoted to the performance of "St. Paul" in the Cathedral—and there will be a closing orchestral service on Friday evening. The vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Damian, Messrs. E. Lloyd and Santley. The band will be under the leadership of M. Sainton, Mr. Langdon Colborne will preside at the organ at the Oratorio performances in the Cathedral, Mr. W. Done will accompany on the pianoforte at the concerts and on the organ at the services, and Mr. C. Harford Lloyd, the Cathedral Organist, will be the Conductor. The works to be performed at the Leeds Triennial Festival have not yet been finally settled; but sufficient has been done to prove how earnest is the desire to provide a programme worthy of the occasion. Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "David and Jonathan," written for the occasion, will of course be a prominent feature in the selection; and another new work, a Cantata by Mr. J. F. Barnett, called "The Building of the Ship" (to Longfellow's words), will no doubt, from the former successes of the composer, be anticipated with much pleasure. The programme will also include Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Handel's "Samson," Haydn's "Creation," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Bach's Cantata, "O Light Everlasting," Cherubini's Mass in D minor, Beethoven's Choral Symphony (which, with so excellent a choir as will be assembled on the occasion, will doubtless receive an exceptionally fine rendering), Sterndale Bennett's Cantata "The May Queen" (composed for the Leeds Festival of 1858), Mendelssohn's "Loreley," and new Overtures by Messrs. Walter Macfarren and Wingham. The choir (which has been carefully chosen, after a most rigid examination), will consist of 300 voices, selected from Leeds and the West Riding. The vocalists already engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Messrs. E. Lloyd and Jos. Maas, Mr. F. King, Mr. Henry Cross, and Herr Henschel. Mr. Arthur Sullivan will be Conductor, Dr. Spark Organist, and Mr. J. Broughton Chorus-Master. The Festival commences on the 13th October. These details will, we are certain, be read with much interest, for they assure us beyond doubt that those who have the direction of our National Music Meetings are now resolved to use their praiseworthy exertions in furtherance of the cause of art as well as of charity.

The revelations on the contents, structure, and reading of musical works, which the critic of the Scotsman has for some time been vouchsafing to a world groping in darkness, deserve a greater currency than even that much-read newspaper can give them. To draw the attention of a wider circle of readers to this new source of light, we shall transmit through the columns of "The Musical Times" a few choice extracts. "It (the Symphony in E flat major) seems to us to afford convincing proof that Schumann was not great in the department of orchestral composition—the very department where his imperfect knowledge of theory would most tell against him. Of melodic charm, beauty of form, or really fine orchestral combinations there are not many examples in this Symphony. It is impossible not to feel that the composer has grasped lofty ideas, and there is no lack of vigour in the work; but there are few persons to whose æsthetic sympathies it will appeal." The intellectual power and æsthetical refinement that speak out of this and other judgments of our critic, the command of technical language, and above all the never-surpassed confidence with which he always enunciates them, are irresistible. At first something within us rebelled against this condemnation of a work we so much admired, but soon we bowed down our head in humbleness and silence; nay, now we must even confess that the condescending benevolence with which this superior mind judges so imperfect a composer as Schumann is really touching. To this remarkable person (whether man, woman, or child we know not) the world owes, however, more than creative criticisms and original utterances on matters æsthetical. Although our critic, with characteristic modesty, makes no such claims, he occasionally enriches musical literature with interesting and precious discoveries. Last year, for instance, he brought to the notice of his readers an undreamt-of chamber work of Schumann's; we think it was a quintet, and written for a somewhat uncommon assortment of instruments, partly of the wind class. Considering what our critic has already accomplished in this respect, we should not be at all surprised to read one of these days of "Variations on a Theme of Meyerbeer's," for two flutes, by Richard Wagner; of a "Suite in Canonic Form," for pianoforte, by Hector Berlioz, or of a "Symphonic Poem," for four bassoons, by Mendelssohn. But, even should we be disappointed in our expectation, we think that this age ought to be proud and grateful for the possession of a dispenser of light and right, who from his lofty judgment-seat can overlook and measure the best and noblest minds the past and present have brought forth—minds to which other men try to look up, and which they behold with awe and veneration.

As a pendant to the Schumann criticism above noticed, we will now collect some curiosa from a review of a translation of Wasielewski's "Life of Robert Schumann." In this review, which appeared about the end of December last in the Guardian (matter, style, and the absence of any signature show that it does not emanate either from "H. S. O." or "C. A. B.," the long-associated musical critics of the paper), we find the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik spoken of as the New Musician Journal, and the Faschingsschwank aus Wien (Carnival Jest from Vienna) as the Carnival Strains from Venice. We are informed that Schumann took his degree as Doctor of Music, while in reality he received his degree as Doctor of Philosophy. Further we learn that the composer's opera "Genoveva" was only four times performed, and his music to "Manfred" only once or twice. It is possible that some of the blunders belong in the first place to the translator, and that the wrong statistics are due to the reviewer's ignorance or forgetfulness of the date of Wasielewski's book, the first edition of which appeared in 1858, and the improved second in 1869. This, however, is no excuse: no man has a right to review who has no independent knowledge of the subject he is discussing. We ourselves have heard "Manfred" at least half a dozen times in different towns and countries, and a well-informed critic could write in 1878 that the sustained applause which "Genoveva" obtains, wherever it is put on the stage with sufficient care, proves its vitality. Without dwelling on the curious conceptions of Schumann's mode of studying and enjoying himself, which the reviewer has carried away from the perusal of the "Life," passing by also all minor criticisms, such as that the composer "in the course of the ensuing year (1841) set to music 138 songs, including some very unpromising specimens," we shall now quote a passage in which the reviewer gives us the sum total of his reckoning. "When his [Schumann's] friends visited him there [in the asylum to which he had been brought after the outbreak of insanity] he was found at the piano producing sounds that reminded them not of 'sweet bells jangled,' but of a machine with its springs broken, still, unable to stop, working on with convulsive jerks. Alas! was not this true of his whole life? Was it not aimless, meaningless for want of a mainspring." What! aimless, meaningless, the life of a man who with singleness of purpose and unwearied perseverance strove to attain the highest and noblest in his art—a man who not only strove but fully realised his object, if we may judge by the love, admiration, and enthusiasm which he has inspired? But this otherwise quite inexplicable dictum finds its explanation in a remark made by the reviewer in introducing the subject to his readers. "This is a melancholy life," he writes, "as a life must be that has no mainspring of faith and hope, but where 'the religion of humanity' is 'regarded as the only authorised standard for conduct.' Perhaps the blank is sadder in a great musical composer than in any one else, because his gift is so connected with the service of praise that even Schumann himself declared that 'a musician's highest aim is to apply his powers to religious music.' But there could be no soul in such work without faith, and 'throughout his life he was free from Church dogmas; he was never subjected to any rigid influences of the sort in his parents' home.'" It would be useless to attempt to convince by argument one whom history and daily experience have not taught that there is no necessary connection between religion and Church dogmas, between religiousness and the observance of certain rites. But were the reviewer right, then many (they may be counted by thousands) who have been looked upon as the leaders and benefactors of men, as the ornaments and enlighteners of humanity, must be ranged in the class of those whose life is aimless and meaningless. Multitudes of names will suggest themselves to the reader. Let us here mention only one, the name of Beethoven, that truly God-intoxicated man.

We sincerely hope that the result of a trial which recently took place in Paris will not embolden the lessees of the Opera-houses in this country to imagine that they are more at liberty than ever to disregard their pledges to the public. M. de Grandsagne, the gentleman who paid the expenses of the journey of a number of artists engaged in an operatic establishment with which he was connected, to witness the performance of "La Favorita" at the Grand-Opéra, as an artistic lesson, felt himself so aggrieved at the fact of an air and the divertissement being cut that he entered an action against the Director of the Opera-house, not only claiming damages for this omission, but urging his right to a hearing of the work as the composer wrote it, under an additional indemnity of 1,600 francs. The verdict was given against him; yet we cannot but think that M. de Grandsagne was an ill-used man. Of course it is not likely that any benevolent and artistic individual, who has an interest in the management of a provincial opera-house, will send the entire company of vocalists to one of our London lyrical establishments at his own cost, just to see how an Opera ought to be performed; but really a person who engages stalls, and takes perhaps the whole of his family at great expense to hear a certain work in its entirety, has a right to some sort of compensation when he finds that a large portion of it is cut out, or that interpolations are introduced which utterly destroy the intention of the composer. Again, when subscriptions are gained on the strength of certain promises in the prospectus of the season, and these promises are unfulfilled without any explanation being given, we can scarcely believe that persons should be expected to bear the disappointment without protest. M. de Grandsagne is a bold man, and deserves the thanks of the opera-going public. Although unsuccessful, he may have done good by mooting the question; and who knows but that some day he may be quoted as a martyr in the cause of operatic reform?

The usual complaint against amateur singing and playing is that it wants "colour"; and although the constant use of this expression proves that we borrow a term from one art to define a quality in another, there can be little doubt that, when applied to music, everybody knows tolerably well what is meant. The truth is that few who are not themselves musicians ever think how much, even in ordinary conversation, the tone of the voice varies; and yet when placed over a room in which a number of persons are talking, every listener must be aware of the fact that the sound conveys the idea of a continuous subdued recitative. Admitting this to be the case in speaking, how much more should the voice be "intoned" (if we may use the term) in singing; and granting the truth that, although the sound is made for us on the pianoforte, the tone is made by ourselves, how necessary it is that the touch (which is the voice of the pianist) should be carefully cultivated to express every shade of feeling. On the principle, then, of proving the necessity of variety of tone in music by showing the effect of the absence of it, we should counsel students, either vocal or instrumental, to seize the earliest opportunity of paying a visit to Faber's "Speaking Machine." Years ago we recollect hearing a purely mechanical voice issue from a machine of this kind—invented, we believe, by the father of the present exhibitor—and have never forgotten the cold, soulless effect of the sentence "How do you do, ladies and gentlemen?" uttered throughout upon one note, and drawn out to double the length of the time any human being would occupy in speaking these few words. Impassive listeners may perhaps merely feel amused at entering into conversation with a "mechanical man," yet we cannot but think that musicians will feel a deeper interest in the exhibition; and pupils will find that, although they cannot receive a lesson from a machine as to what they are to do, they will at least receive one as to what they are not to do.

Looking over the programme of a concert a few evenings since, we could not help being struck with the sameness in character of the words of the songs, which, with only one exception, commenced with a gleam of the light of life, and ended with a shadow of the gloom of death. Of course these violent contrasts in the poetry materially help weak composers, but we are inclined to believe that a couple of hours of unmitigated tragedy can scarcely be called a healthy musical performance. In our reviews upon the vocal pieces of the day in this journal we have often before alluded to the subject; but it was not until a number of these melancholy effusions were placed together in one evening that we were so fully convinced of their depressing effect upon the listeners. A meeting of two lovers, for instance, full of hope and joy, was sure to be followed by a scene descriptive of the grief of the bereft one, as he or she gazed upon the conventional little "mound of earth." A mother looking into the loving eyes of her child, and thankful for the glow of health upon its cheek, was doomed to see that glow gradually lessen, and to watch through dreary days and nights at the side of her tender charge until it is "snatched away." A wife whose husband is at sea anxiously waits his return at her cottage door; but he comes not! The storm arises, as the song proceeds, according to rule; and through the moaning of the wind she faintly hears the groans of the crew as the ship "sinks beneath the waves." Away, we say, with such misery made to order as this! Let us have at least some words full of joy, hope, or content. Why, we could name fifty old songs which, without much claim to high poetical thought, can be always listened to with pleasure. But here are two lines by a true poet which describe, in homely fashion, how a couple can grow old together:—

> But blessings on thy frosty pow,
> John Anderson my Jo.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Verdi's "Trovatore" was played for the only time this season on the 3rd ult., for the purpose of introducing Madame Telma in the part of the heroine. The débutante has an agreeable voice, and sings and acts as if she were well acquainted with the vocal and histrionic requirements of the character, creating a good impression both in her first aria and in the energetic scene with Manrico at the end of the third act, and eliciting throughout warm, but not enthusiastic, marks of approbation. A numerous audience assembled on the closing night of the season, the 6th ult., when Mr. Carl Rosa appeared, for the first time since his indisposition, at the Conductor's desk, and was greeted with a demonstration of feeling such as indeed is but rarely accorded, even to those who have worthily earned the public gratitude. But Mr. Rosa is an exceptional instance of one who, setting before himself a task to accomplish, has so steadily persevered for years—even to the injury of his health—that he has now not only reached the goal of his ambition, but won the admiration of all who have watched, and sympathised with, his efforts. Thanks to his zealous exertions, Opera in English has at length a home in this country; and that English Opera may shortly be received under the same hospitable roof is now the one thing to be worked for by this unwearied champion in the cause. Although unfortunately illness deprived the company of the active services of Mr. Carl Rosa, the season has been an extremely interesting one, thanks to the fact of both the business and the artistic arrangements being left in thoroughly competent hands. Mr. Randegger, as Conductor (ably seconded by Mr. Pew), has insured highly satisfactory performances of the Operas; and all the vocalists seem to have done their utmost to make the absence of the chief of the establishment felt as little as possible. The advance of Miss Julia Gaylord, both as a singer and an actress, has been most decisive; and Miss Georgina Burns and Miss Josephine Yorke have also materially increased their reputation. As a rule the rendering of every Opera during the season has evidenced the extreme care bestowed upon its preparation—in many instances indeed being so good as to eclipse the efforts at our fashionable Italian lyrical establishments—and we can assure Mr. Rosa and his excellent company that whenever they return to us they will be received with a cordial and sincere welcome.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

With the four evening performances we have to record during last month, the season proper of these excellent Concerts has come to a close, an extra Concert, for the benefit of Sir Julius Benedict, having been announced for the 24th ult. On the first of the occasions alluded to (the 1st ult.) Herr Barth, the eminent Berlin artist, was the pianist, and in his solo performance fairly electrified his numerous audience. In a manner which may be described as absolutely irreproachable the pianist played (for the first time here) a selection from Brahms's "Studien für Pianoforte" (Op. 35), consisting of a series of variations on a theme by Paganini, skilfully elaborated by the composer, who, with surprising raffinement, has contrived to introduce into his work an abundance of passages of extreme difficulty taxing to the utmost the technical skill of the performer.

That Herr Barth proved himself fully equal to his self-elected task we have already inferred, adding as he did to a faultless technique the grace and refinement of an intelligent artist. Herr Barth, we need scarcely say, belongs to the most advanced school of modern pianoforte-playing, but his style is free from that individual obtrusiveness which characterises some of its representatives. Having been recalled twice, the pianist satisfied the persistent demands for an encore by substituting another piece. Herr Joachim contributed the only other instrumental solo of the evening by playing, in his best style, Bach's Chaconne in D minor, which was also, as a matter of course, redemanded, the appeal being responded to by the additional performance of a movement from the same composer's violin Sonatas. The Concert opened with a capital performance of Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, for two violins, viola, two French horns, violoncello, and contra-bass, led by Herr Joachim, and supported by MM. Ries, Zerbini, Mann, Standen, Reynolds, and Piatti; and concluded with Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 70), in the excellent rendering of which Herr Barth was associated with MM. Joachim and Piatti. Both works had been frequently heard at the Popular Concerts before. Herr Henschel gave a very effective rendering of the recitative "Tyrannic love," and air "Ye verdant hills," from Handel's oratorio "Susanna," and of two songs by Brahms and the vocalist himself respectively, accompanied by M. Zerbini.

The second Concert of the past month (the 8th ult.) brought a repetition of Dvořák's Sestet in A major, for two violins, two violas, and two violoncellos, to the first performance of which in this country we have already referred in our last notice of these Concerts. The composer, who is a native of Bohemia, shows a decided leaning towards the modern German school of music as represented by Johannes Brahms, his style also, perhaps as a natural consequence, showing traces of the influence of Robert Schumann. But Herr Dvořák's artistic and, if the term may be allowed, his national individuality is sufficiently pronounced to distinguish his work most favourably from the productions of some of the younger disciples of the school just mentioned, wherein shallow pretentiousness and elaborate diffuseness combine in the endeavour to conceal the utter absence of anything like vigorous original thought. The Sestet now under notice is, in fact, a masterly composition, both as regards musicianlike elaboration and the well-sustained and varied interest attaching to the movements of which it is composed. Among these, the second entitled "Dumka" (elegy) in D minor, consisting of several divisions, including an adagio, quasi tempo di marcia in F sharp minor, may be instanced as specially remarkable for its exquisite, albeit dreamy, poetry, and tender pathos, characteristic of the national music of Slavonic origin. A similar national element also pervades the Presto in A major (with Trio in D major) which takes the place of the orthodox Scherzo, and the Allegro moderato in A major and the Allegretto grazioso in the same key, though suffering somewhat from undue lengths, form a worthy prologue and epilogue respectively to the entire work. The executants were MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti, to whose united efforts, no doubt, as much as to the intrinsic merits of the new composition, the enthusiastic applause with which it was received may be attributed. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who never misses an opportunity of reminding her audience of the existence of the musical treasures bestowed upon the nation by Sterndale Bennett, played with her wonted brilliancy and refinement that composer's charming musical trifles, entitled respectively "The Lake, the Millstream, and the Fountain." Later in the evening the accomplished lady introduced, for the first time at these Concerts, a Suite in D (Op. 19) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, composed by herself and admirably executed in conjunction with MM. Joachim and Piatti. The Suite consists, as its name would imply, of a series of loosely connected movements bearing the stamp of an imaginative and earnest artist, and its performance was greeted with much applause. The only vocal number in the programme consisted of Herr Henschel's "Serbisches Liederspiel," in the rendering of which Miss Lillian Bailey, Mdlle. Hohenschild, MM. Shakespeare and Thorndike took part, the composer playing the accompaniment.

The programme of the succeeding Concert (the 15th ult.) commenced with Mendelssohn's Octett for stringed instruments, one of the numerous instances of the marvellous precocity of the composer's genius, this beautiful work having been written when he was yet a mere boy. Its performance on this occasion (the fifteenth at these Concerts) was throughout admirable, being led by Herr Joachim, who was supported by MM. Ries, Pollitzer, Wiener, Straus, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti. A feature of special interest was the rendering by Herren Joachim and Straus of a Duo Concertante in A minor by Spohr, than whom none knew better how to write for the particular instrument of which he was himself such a consummate master. The exquisite blending both of tone and style on the part of the two virtuosi resulted in the complete realization of the rich and manifold beauties of the composition, and the performance in question will not easily be forgotten by the audience, who testified to their appreciation by long-continued applause. Miss Zimmermann contributed the only instrumental solo of the evening by a spirited rendering of Weber's Grand Pianoforte Sonata in D minor (Op. 49), one of four similar works of high artistic significance by that composer, which are unfortunately too much neglected by modern professors of the instrument. There are some inaccuracies in the biographical remarks of the analytical programme, Weber having been neither "one-fourth Danish in blood," as here stated, nor was he born in 1785, but in the following year. We mention this specially, as we so frequently meet with similar erroneous statements concerning the composer of "Freischütz." The Concert concluded with Beethoven's popular variations on Wenzel Müller's air, "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu," played with the usual success by Miss Zimmermann, MM. Joachim and Piatti. Mr. Arthur Oswald, who was the vocalist, sang with artistic feeling and good declamation songs by Gounod and Sterndale Bennett. He is gifted with a high baritone of a very sympathetic timbre, and manages his voice in a manner which shows good schooling. M. Zerbini was the accompanist.

The Concert on the 22nd ult. being for the Director's benefit, the programme was, as usual on such occasions, an exceptionally strong one, including Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat; three pieces for pianoforte and violoncello by Rubinstein; three of Schumann's "Phantasiestücke," for pianoforte solo; three movements from Mozart's Divertimento in E flat, for string trio; and the Hungarian Dances, Nos. 3, 4, and 10, by Brahms, arranged for the violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, by Herr Joachim. All of these compositions having been more or less frequently heard at these concerts before, it is needless to refer to them in detail now. It will be sufficient to state that the executive artists in the Quintet were MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti, a combination of names the mere mention of which suggests harmonious co-operation and earnest artistic endeavour to realise to the fullest extent the intentions of the composers whose works these artists may be interpreting. Miss Zimmermann was associated with Signor Piatti in the rendering of Rubinstein's melodious Duos; Mdlle. Janotha playing the "Phantasiestücke" and obtaining the usual encore. The last mentioned lady also played the pianoforte part to the Hungarian Dances, which are old favourites with this audience, and, with Herr Joachim as their interpreter, never fail to produce renewed enthusiasm. Mr. Santley greatly added to the enjoyment of the evening by singing, in his best manner, Schubert's "Erl King" and airs by Scarlatti and Gounod. M. Zerbini, who had been throughout the season a most efficient Conductor, again filled that post on this occasion. The hall was well filled, though not so densely crowded as we have known it to be on previous last nights of this institution. The concerts will be resumed early in November next.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

At the Saturday concert on February 28 Herr Joachim was the principal attraction. He brought forward on that occasion Spohr's twelfth concerto (in A major), and a new set of variations for violin and orchestra from his own pen. The concerto of Spohr, though worth an occasional hearing, is not one of the best works of this class which its composer has written. Herr Joachim's variations are of great interest. The orchestra is treated not as a mere accompaniment to the solo instrument, but as an important factor in the whole work. The solo part, as might be anticipated, is of great difficulty, but, with such playing as that of its composer, highly effective. The orchestral pieces at this concert were the second symphony by Beethoven, the overture to "Guillaume Tell," and a quaint and pleasing "Chaconne and Rigadon" from "Aline," an opera by Monsigny, a now forgotten French composer, who flourished in the middle of the last century. The only vocalist of the afternoon was Miss Marian Williams, who sang "Selva opaca" from "Guillaume Tell," and Alftruda's scena from Mr. E. Prout's "Hereward."

The concert of the 6th ult. was noteworthy for one of the very finest performances ever heard of the "Eroïca" symphony. We have often had occasion to remark that no such renderings of orchestral music are to be listened to anywhere as those given under the direction of Mr. Manns; but on this afternoon the Crystal Palace band surpassed itself, and those who were present will not soon forget the impression produced. Herr Robert Hausmann, professor of the violoncello at the Royal High School of Music, Berlin, made his first appearance at these concerts on the same afternoon, with Schumann's concerto in A minor. This work is but seldom performed, even on the Continent, and had only once before been given in London—by Signor Piatti, at one of the concerts of the Musical Society of London many years since. Its comparative neglect is readily to be accounted for. The solo part is very difficult without being proportionately effective, and as a composition it by no means ranks among Schumann's best. The slow movement is beautiful, but the rest of the work is deficient in interest. Herr Hausmann's playing was excellent, both in regard to tone and execution. Madame Patey sang an air from Dr. Sullivan's "Light of the World," and Mr. J. F. Barnett's song "The Golden Gate," and the Ballet Music from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" formed a pleasing conclusion to a very interesting concert.

On the following Saturday (the 13th) Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B flat, received a rendering hardly less fine than that of the "Eroïca" in the previous week, the other orchestral pieces of the afternoon being Sterndale Bennett's Prelude and Funeral March to the "Ajax" of Sophocles (not one of the composer's strongest works), and Svendsen's fourth "Rhapsodie Norvégienne," a composition in which the national melodies of Norway are effectively treated. Much interest attached to the first performance in England of a posthumous violin concerto by the late Hermann Goetz. Like all of his music which has come under our notice, the concerto possesses marked individuality; but, so far as can be judged by a single hearing, it is hardly one of his most successful efforts. The music is very graceful and frequently pleasing; but there is a singular want of energy in it. In form it is unusual; the three movements of which it consists are connected without a break, so as to form a continuous whole. The subjects are announced in the first allegro; the andante then takes the place usually occupied by the "free fantasia," or working out of the themes, and the finale ("tempo primo") corresponds to the last part of a first movement in the usual form, both first and second subjects being repeated in the tonic key. The solo part was extremely well played by Herr Hugo Heermann, from Frankfort. Miss Thekla Friedländer sang a scena, "Sappho," by Robert Volkmann, which we heard on this occasion for the first, and we hope for the last, time. It is not only uninteresting and noisy, but absolutely unpleasant to listen to. In his attempt to depict Sappho's despair and madness Herr Volkmann has gone far beyond the limits of dramatic music. Mr. Edward Lloyd gave charmingly a song from Mozart's "Seraglio," and Piatti's serenade, "Awake, awake."

On the 20th a new work by a young English composer, Mr. F. Corder, was brought to a hearing. Mr. Corder is already favourably known at the Crystal Palace by his Masque from "Morte d'Arthur," played there last season. The work produced on this occasion was a characteristic suite in five movements for orchestra, entitled "In the Black Forest." Each of the movements contains points of interest, but we must especially commend No. 2, "The Brooklet," a charming allegretto, full of pleasing melody and admirably treated, and the adagio (No. 3), entitled "Noontide Stillness." Mr. Corder has ideas of his own, and knows how to make the most of them. His instrumentation also is tasteful, and not without originality. The suite was most warmly applauded, and the composer called forward at its close. Herr Barth was the pianist at this concert. His rendering of Chopin's concerto in F minor was one of the finest in our remembrance, being not only technically perfect, but full of feeling. Mr. Santley sang "Au bruit des lourds marteaux" from Gounod's "Philémon et Baucis," and two pleasing songs by Miss Maude White. The symphony was Beethoven's in C minor, which was played to perfection by the orchestra.

THE BACH CHOIR.

This Choir began its fifth season at St. James's Hall on the 16th ult. The members mustered in as strong force as ever, there was an efficient orchestra, and the Conductor was again Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. More important still perhaps was the attendance of a large and distinguished audience, who showed the utmost interest in what was done, and sat the Concert out with exemplary and unusual patience. This may have been due, not alone to a sense of propriety, but to the attraction of the programme, which was great from first to last. The proceedings began with Sir John Goss's Anthem in eight parts "Lift up thine eyes"; a work which is not only one of the best productions of the composer, but one of the best in the whole repertory of the English Church. The opening chorus is especially fine, and illustrates the mingling of grace and grandeur so often found in Sir John's productions. The Bach Choir will do well to continue their explorations among church music. They will find much that has been unjustly neglected, and not a little eminently worthy of honour. The performance of the anthem, in which the recitative was taken by Mr. Shakespeare, and the organ well played by Mr. Pettit, was exceedingly good, and made a marked impression. This was followed by the best rendering of Brahms's German "Requiem" that has yet been given in this country. We need not again discuss the merits of the work: it has taken its place, and a high place, in English estimation. There may be reasons why a long time must pass before it can become generally popular, but musicians everywhere hold it in high honour, as a remarkable exhibition both of learning and genius. The music is of enormous difficulty, and severely taxes the powers of the best performers; but the Bach Choir did not measure their strength against it rashly. It is true that some movements were less well given than others; but, on the whole, and looking at the work to be done, the performance was of remarkable merit, reflecting the highest credit on all concerned. The solos were taken by Mrs. Osgood and Herr Henschel. The lady sang well, although the music put some strain upon her powers, and the gentleman was, of course, perfectly at home with the work of his friend and countryman. At the close of the performance the applause was hearty, but not more hearty than just. The second part of the Concert began with the Gloria from Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli." Here again the Bach Choir promises to do good work. It is well that music should advance, but it should carry its treasures with it, and leave none of them behind. Much, unfortunately, has been dropped on the way, but musicians are now beginning to go back for it, and our hope is that the name of the great Italian Church composer will continue to appear from time to time in our concert programmes. The example chosen by the Bach Choir is one of much representative merit, and leads to the hope that at some future time the entire Mass may be given. Bach's Magnificat in D, for five-part chorus, soli, and orchestra, with additional accompaniments by Robert Franz, brought the Concert to an end. The exceptional merits of this fine work have been fully discussed in our columns, and are well known to every admirer of the master. The Magnificat, it is true, is not often publicly performed, but this arises from a combination of difficulties which places it beyond the executive means of average choral associations; as those means improve, and appreciation of Bach's music deepens, the work is sure to be more frequently heard.

Meanwhile, thanks are due to the Bach Choir for giving us a performance which left no beauty unconcealed. The solos were taken by Mrs. Osgood, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Shakespeare, and Herr Henschel, all of whom sang with as much care and success as though their task were not both difficult and ungracious. Looking back upon the entire Concert we cannot too highly praise the exertions of Mr. Goldschmidt and his zealous followers.

The second and last Concert is announced for the 21st instant, when Bach's Sanctus in D, and Cherubini's Solemn Mass in the same key will be performed for the first time in London.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

The third Subscription Concert was given at the Shoreditch Town Hall on the 9th ult., before a large audience. Gade's Cantata, "The Erl King's Daughter," occupied the first part of the programme, and was received with such evident gratification as to make us wonder how it can be that a work appealing so eloquently to a mixed assembly of listeners, as well as to the educated musician, so seldom gains a hearing in the metropolis. The exquisite colouring of the choruses, and the dramatic power evidenced in the treatment of the varied phases of the story—especially in the passages where the Erl King's daughter invites Oluf to dance, and, finding that he refuses, lays her icy hand upon his head—proves that the composer is a true poet as well as a true musician. We may likewise cite the chorus of Erl maidens, "Lightly through the wood" (interwoven with the baritone solo), and the "Morning Hymn," as veritable masterpieces; very much of the solo music being also written with a thorough appreciation of the weird character of the legend. The orchestration too—ever forcibly illustrating, but never exaggerating, the text—is delicate and fanciful in the extreme, the combinations of wind instruments and the use of the horns in various solo passages being especially remarkable for beauty of effect. The execution of the whole of the choral music reflected the highest credit upon both choir and Conductor; for, as no amount of dry study of the notes could have ensured so perfect a result, we may be assured that both teacher and pupils have worked with mind as well as voice. Many of the choruses would certainly have been redemanded had not encores been strictly forbidden—a law which, much as we should have liked to listen to repetitions, we are glad to see rigidly enforced. The solo vocalists were Miss Berrie Stephens (the Erl King's Daughter), Miss Minnie Webbe (the Mother), and Mr. Hervet D'Egville (Sir Oluf), all of whom sang the music satisfactorily, although in many parts energy and dramatic feeling (especially on the part of Sir Oluf) were wanting to sustain the interest of the legend. In the second part Hermann Goetz's "Nœnia," for chorus and orchestra, again displayed the exceptional powers of the choir to the utmost advantage, the singing of this difficult music indeed being fully worthy of the work itself. We have already in "The Musical Times" on two occasions spoken of the masterly writing in this composition, and need now only say that a fresh hearing of it reveals fresh beauties. No words can convey the faintest idea of the profound impression produced by the musical enunciation of the phrase, "And the beautiful must perish"; of the chorus commencing in F sharp major, "But forth she came from the sea"; or of the final choral piece, exquisitely accompanied, in which both the musician and the poet so powerfully unite to convey to us the eternal truth that the mean and base pass "unsung to the grave." We cannot but lament that a man who could produce such music should have been snatched away so early from a world which during his brief career he has done so much to enrich. The applause at the conclusion of the work fully showed how thoroughly appreciative an audience these Concerts can now command. The other pieces in the programme were Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette" (both of which were admirably played); Eaton Faning's clever chorus, "Song of the Vikings"; "Ah perdona" (carefully rendered by Miss Berrie Stephens and Miss Minnie Webbe); "The Toreador's Song," from "Carmen," sung by Mr. D'Egville; and the Market Chorus from "Masaniello," the charmingly fresh and melodious character of which sent away the audience in the utmost good humour. The Concert was conducted by Mr. Ebenezer Prout with his accustomed care and intelligence.

ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The Concert given by this Society on the 4th ult. was of unusual interest, because the programme, departing somewhat from the regular course, contained novelty in addition to the welcome and well-known "Lobgesang" of Mendelssohn. When a musical institution is under the necessity of living it is bound to accommodate itself to the conditions which make life possible, and as unfamiliar works are not run after by our public, it is unreasonable to expect their frequent presentation. Now and then, however, managers may venture to think of persons who are subject to musical curiosity, and this was done to good purpose on the occasion of which we speak. A better selection from the list of comparatively unknown works could not have been made than Hiller's "Song of Victory," and Goetz's Psalm 137, "By the Waters of Babylon," neither of which had previously been performed in public to a London audience—though, perhaps, the distinction between the audience of the London Musical Society, by which Goetz's Psalm was produced last year, and a public one is not very great. Hiller's work eminently deserved a hearing. Like the "Song of Triumph" of Brahms, it is an outcome of the Franco-German war, having been composed during, or immediately upon the stupendous series of victories which humbled the hereditary foe of the Teuton. The "Song of Victory," first brought out, if we rightly remember, at a Nieder Rheinische Festival held at Cologne shortly after the close of the war, at once arrested attention and excited admiration by its fervour of spirit and loftiness of expression. Dr. Hiller evidently wrote it under the stimulus of great exaltation of mind. There is nothing perfunctory or laboured in the pages of the work from beginning to end, while the pervading style is eminently suited to the utterance of a grand national feeling, being throughout simple and forcible. For the most part, as need scarcely be said, the "Song" is one of triumph and rejoicing, and something of Handelian breadth and grandeur constitutes therefore its leading characteristic. But minor chords are here and there touched with happy effect, as when reference is made to the mourning and grief which temper the joy of every victory. Dr. Hiller has turned the opportunities so afforded to good use, and certainly not the least striking number in the work is the treble solo and (female) chorus, "He in tears that soweth." The whole composition ranks high, and we trust to hear of it from time to time as an established feature in the repertory of English choral societies. Its reception at the Albert Hall was cordial enough to warrant a repetition at no distant date. Goetz's Psalm has been so often discussed in our columns lately that there is no need for more words of description or eulogy. Enough that, thanks to a capital performance, the charm of this lovely composition was fully brought to bear upon the audience, who, if really amateurs, must have recognised in the music powers indicative of the highest genius. With what effect the familiar "Lobgesang" was given may be imagined, as may, with equal facility, the pleasure it afforded. The solo vocalists, who acquitted themselves remarkably well throughout, were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Marriott, Mr. M'Guckin, and Mr. F. King. Dr. Stainer presided at the organ, and Mr. Barnby conducted with the efficiency he long since taught us to look for at his hands.

MR. HALLÉ'S ORCHESTRA.

Rumour says—but we do not vouch for its truth—that when talk arose about accepting the services of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra at the approaching Leeds Festival, the idea was met and crushed by a retort that the band had only a provincial reputation. Assuming the correctness of this statement, it is not difficult to understand the appearance of Mr. Hallé and his instrumentalists in St. James's Hall. They came rather for the purpose of making known their capabilities, and challenging metropolitan criticism, than to play such familiar works as Beethoven's Third and Seventh Symphonies, Schubert's Symphony in C, and the Overtures to "Anacreon" and "Fidelio" (No. 3), or even Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2). It was not necessary to travel so far merely to do this, however interesting Mr. Hallé's reading of masterpieces may be to comparative criticism. But the actual purpose of the enterprise needs no vindication. Mr. Hallé is naturally proud of the orchestra he has founded and built up, and it was to be expected that he would, sooner or later, seek to obtain for it the favourable verdict of a London audience. Moreover, it was well that metropolitan amateurs should have an opportunity of knowing what is being done in the provinces, and of opening their eyes to the fact that they by no means monopolise the supply of good players, or exclusively enjoy the masterpieces of orchestral art.

Two performances were given in one day, for which reason it is only fair to judge the orchestra by what was done at the first. A man's staying power may be great, but he cannot play in two long symphonies, to say nothing of overtures and songs, in the afternoon, and in the evening return to achieve the same task with undiminished freshness. The afternoon performance, which included the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and Schubert's No. 9, of "heavenly length," was certainly very fine, notably so in regard to the unity which prevailed in the orchestra. This is the first essential of good orchestral work. "Man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he hath," neither does the supreme value of a band depend upon the individual eminence of those who comprise it. A better performance may be given by inferior players who are at one with each other and their conductor than by the same number of virtuosi not thus united. Mr. Hallé's orchestra is all that can be wished in this respect. Their opportunities are exceptional and they have so used them as that one mind and one spirit—the mind and spirit of Mr. Hallé himself—animate the whole. Taking the band in detail, we find it not free from blemish. The violins are, if anything, less brilliant than those to which we are accustomed in London orchestras; though the double basses, on the other hand, are magnificent. A bad effect is produced, moreover, by the loudness and harshness of the first oboe, and the too great sonority of the drums. These things apart, there seems to us nothing of which to complain. Both concerts made an exceedingly good impression, and the conducting of Mr. Hallé, so clear, so spirited, and so intelligent, placed him as a chef d'orchestre high in the estimation of metropolitan amateurs. The vocalists who assisted to vary the proceedings were Miss Lillian Bailey, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Herr Henschel, and Mr. Santley.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S CONCERT.

It is possible to express sympathy and even admiration for Mr. Bache, in his persistent and untiring efforts to secure appreciation for the works of Franz Liszt, without feeling any excessive enthusiasm for the cause he has so much at heart. Men of his stamp, who are willing to make large personal sacrifice in what they deem to be a righteous enterprise, are few enough in the world of music. The fifteen years covered by Mr. Bache's labours have witnessed a revolution in English musical opinion. We no longer declare that Mendelssohn was the last of the great composers, nor close our ears to the contemporary development of the art in Germany. We have taken Brahms and Wagner and Goetz into our confidence, and to anyone who arises boasting himself to be somebody we listen with critical ears, and accept or reject him only after due trial. But, alas for Mr. Bache! the majority of us continue to feel dislike or indifference towards the master of his especial choice. The "Faust Symphony," performed for the first time in England on the 11th ult., may be taken as representative of the Liszt method, and by it he might readily elect to stand or fall. If the true mission of music is merely to excite emotions of a wholly pleasurable nature, the greater portion of this Symphony must be unreservedly condemned. But the new doctrinaires would join issue with such a view of the art. If we understand them rightly, they would say, "You do not condemn Shakespeare's 'Macbeth,' or his 'King Lear,' because the one arouses feelings of the utmost horror, and the other rends the heart with its awful pathos. The mental struggles of Faust and the ghastly cynicism of Mephistopheles as expressed in poetry excite your highest admiration. Why should not the same ideas be portrayed in music? The divine art is capable of better things than titillating the ears and lulling the senses. We claim for it all the functions that appertain to poetry, while you would let it minister only to your sensual enjoyment." Here is the case, and it cannot be denied that it is worthy of discussion in all its bearings. But this is not the time for such disquisitions, and the "Faust Symphony" must undergo the ordeal of criticism as abstract music. Thus considered, the Gretchen movement may be pronounced full of meaning and in many parts extremely melodious. But the Faust movement is vague and intolerably long, while the section denominated Mephistopheles is remarkable for a succession of more or less hideous noises. The performance was on the whole remarkably good, considering the immense difficulties of the work; but there were a few slips, and the opening of the middle movement was spoilt by the very imperfect rendering of the solo viola part. The chorus of eighty male voices (placed in front of the orchestra after the continental fashion) greatly aided the effect of the solemn climax. Mr. Bache repeated his performance of Chopin's F minor concerto, and the programme also included the overture to "Zauberflöte." Mr. Manns conducted these latter works, and the Concert-giver directed the symphony.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

The performance of a musical work under circumstances diverse from those contemplated by the composer, may in certain instances be allowable but can never be entirely satisfactory. Mr. Henry Leslie deserves praise rather than blame for the opportunities he affords the musical public of hearing Mendelssohn's sublime music to "Antigone," but it cannot be denied that the work loses much of its effect when deprived of its stage surroundings. Years ago, when the tragedy was performed at Covent Garden, with the Vandenhoffs in the leading parts, it was received with much favour; and surely some enterprising manager, bearing in mind the great increase in musical culture of late, might do worse than organise a series of performances both of the "Antigone" and the "Œdipus," at some suitable theatre. Having dropped this hint, we return to the performance of the 5th ult., which was, perhaps, the most successful ever given by Mr. Leslie. The choir of 240 male voices delivered the choruses with splendid force, especially the noble "Hymn to Bacchus," one of Mendelssohn's finest inspirations. The dialogue, compressed as much as possible, was delivered by Miss Tennyson, who acquitted herself of a somewhat ungrateful task in a manner worthy of the warmest commendation. An earnest, but by no means exaggerated style, a rich and nicely modulated voice, and perfect elocution, were the characteristics of Miss Tennyson's oratory, and the recall she obtained was heartily deserved. It should be added that full justice was rendered to the lovely quartet, "O Eros," by Messrs. Albert James, Arthur Thomas, F. A. Bridge, and J. Langman. In the second part of the concert, Herr Joachim played Beethoven's Violin Concerto and Bach's Suite de Pièces in E as he alone can play such works. The selection from Mr. Leslie's new Biblical Pastoral, comprising the Shepherd's Chorus, "Now to Bethlehem let us go," and Mary's Song—the latter finely sung by Miss Orridge—were well received by the audience, and the Concert concluded with Mendelssohn's spirited "Ruy Blas" Overture.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The third Concert of the season was given on the 4th ult., the only novelty in the programme being M. Massenet's Overture "Phèdre," which, clever as it undoubtedly is, made but little impression. The work contains many good points, but it is fragmentary, and but rarely conjured up in the mind of the auditor the tragic incidents of the subject it is presumed to illustrate. Herr Joachim's performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and of his own variations (which he recently introduced with such success at a Crystal Palace Concert), created the enthusiasm which such exceptional playing must always produce; and Madame Patey, in J. F. Barnett's Aria "The Golden Gate," and Haydn's Canzonet "She never told her love," was heard to the utmost advantage, both songs being admirably suited to her voice and style. The orchestral works were Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2), Beethoven's Overture (Op. 124), and the Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito." At the fourth Concert, on the 18th ult., Herr Joachim again produced the greatest effect of the evening by his masterly rendering of Brahms's Concerto, which he has so thoroughly made his own—at least in this country—that it is scarcely likely to be heard during his absence. Randegger's highly dramatic Scena "Medea"—finely sung by Mrs. Osgood—must also be mentioned as one of the successful items of the selection; and Schumann's Symphony in C received an interpretation which reflected the utmost credit both upon the members of the orchestra and their Conductor, Mr. W. G. Cusins. In every respect, although the programme contained nothing absolutely new, this was one of the most interesting concerts yet given this season.

The following highly interesting notice of the Annual Edinburgh University Concert is slightly abbreviated from the Edinburgh Courant of the 16th ult.:—

Last night the crowded and distinguished audience assembled in the Music Hall were in a position to form some estimate of the advance made in musical culture by the students of Edinburgh University. It is something to know that we have one who is able to draw out to its full capacity the musical talent possessed by the incessantly changing constituency of our great University. In referring to this Concert, which, in respect to its student-chorus, is of special and unique interest, it should be borne in mind that some half of that chorus are almost raw recruits in the service of music. We believe that the majority of its members commenced their musical practice this winter, and that little, if anything, of the art was known to them before some four months ago. In such circumstances, their excellent form is really surprising. Of course the advantage of a general liberal education must greatly diminish difficulties otherwise scarcely surmountable. And the intelligence and general refinement exhibited in the students' efforts last night unmistakably showed the great advantage alluded to, the feeling being conveyed that if the performance was occasionally not up to the mark of professional choralists, it had a verve about it which the latter frequently have not, and which in a great measure made up for some technical deficiencies unavoidable in the peculiar circumstances to which we have alluded. With such a splendid selection of music as that contained in the programme, the thirteenth Annual Concert of the Society could not fail of success. In the opening song, "Gaudeamus," the harmony of voices was fair, as well as in the part-song, "The red wine flows." The attraction of "The Troubadour" (the composition of Professor Oakeley) seemed to be overpowering, and the encore was irresistible. Professor Blackie must have been delighted with the reception given to the Scottish songs which were accorded a place in the programme. They were charmingly arranged as choruses by Sir Herbert Oakeley, and the air, "What's a' the steer, kimmer?" was harmonised in a manner which thoroughly entranced the audience, whose demands for an encore again proved irresistible. Miss Wakefield sang Beethoven's song, "All Nature shows a Creator's glory," and two pieces of Sterndale Bennett's, "Dawn, gentle flower" and "Sing, maiden, sing." This lady possesses a voice of great purity and beauty; her rendering of Beethoven was superb, and she sang the two other airs in a manner which carried the audience with her completely. The instrumental part of the Concert was as great a success as the vocal. Mendelssohn's Concert-Overture, "Ruy Blas," the second item on the programme for the evening, appeared to be most appreciated by the audience, although Rossini's Overture, "La Gazza Ladra," the concluding piece, was most piquant and attractive. Sir Herbert Oakeley himself conducted as usual, and, between the enthusiastic regard of what may fairly be termed his pupils and the evident satisfaction of the audience, must have felt some measure of recompense for his energetic labours in furthering the interests of the noble science of which he is the guardian. Last night's work afforded a gratifying proof of the progress made by the musical renaissance in Scotland—a work to which the Professor of Music has so largely contributed.

On Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., the Rev. H. Bonavia Hunt, Warden of Trinity College, London, presided at a demonstration of the Tonic Sol-fa method of teaching harmony and of playing the pianoforte and organ, which was conducted by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, A.R.A.M. The lecturer said that his object was to prove the possibility of playing from Tonic Sol-fa notation, and to show the advantages which that notation possessed in the study of harmony. Mr. Jarvis, Organist of the Parish Church of Swanscombe, Kent, who has a Tonic Sol-fa choir of thirty men and boys, then played several pieces on the organ from Tonic Sol-fa, transposing them into any key named by the Chairman. He also played a piece at first sight, transposing it from D minor into E minor. Miss Abel played at first sight an anthem by Sir George Elvey in Tonic Sol-fa, and afterwards transposed it from F into G. Mr. Curwen then explained the Tonic Sol-fa nomenclature of harmony, and showed that key relationship, which was the one central fact of harmony, was forced upon the attention of the pupils by the letter notation, and thus progress was made rapid and easy. Dr. Westbrook, in moving a vote of thanks to the lecturer, said they must all feel that they had gained information and had had prejudices removed. The possibility of playing from Tonic Sol-fa had undoubtedly been shown, but to him, with a slight acquaintance with the notation, it appeared far harder than the staff notation. The Rev. H. B. Hunt seconded the motion, which was carried, as was also a vote of thanks to those who had assisted in the demonstration.

The 142nd Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was celebrated at Willis's Rooms on the 17th ult., under the presidency of Major-General Lord Chelmsford. In addition to an eloquent speech by the Chairman in introducing the toast "Prosperity to the Royal Society of Musicians," there were several addresses during the evening, Mr. Cummings, the honorary treasurer, in proposing the health of Lord Chelmsford, paying an appropriate tribute to the efficient manner in which he had discharged the duties of President. It is seldom that we mention the special items of the musical programme at this dinner; but allusion must be made to the charming and thoroughly artistic rendering of three of Herr Henschel's beautiful songs from "The Water Babies" by Miss Lillian Bailey, to the vocal contributions of Herr Henschel himself, to the fine performance of Mendelssohn's little-known Concertstücke in F minor, for clarionet and corno di bassetto, by Mr. Julian Egerton and Mr. Maycock (accompanied with skill and judgment on the pianoforte by Mr. Charles Gardner), and to the excellent playing of two pianoforte solos by Madame Frickenhaus. In noticing the singing of the choral portion of the selection, by the London Vocal Union under the direction of Mr. Fred. Walker, mention must also in justice be made of the excellent manner in which the tenor solo in the National Anthem was rendered. The name of the young vocalist to whom this was intrusted we ascertained to be Hanson, and we commend him to the attention of all who would desire to aid in bringing such exceptional talent to the front.

A highly influential Committee has been formed for raising a fund to present a testimonial to Mr. Grove on his retirement from the board of the Crystal Palace Company. The services of Mr. Grove to musical art in connection with the Saturday Concerts at the Palace, since their establishment twenty-five years ago, are well known; for not only have his critical analyses (signed "G") in the programmes of these performances materially aided the public in the appreciation of the works given, but we have to thank him for the introduction into England of those forgotten works of Schubert which he rescued from obscurity during a visit to Germany, undertaken expressly for that purpose. He is also the originator and editor of the excellent Musical Dictionary which bears his name; and his contributions to the "Dictionary of the Bible," and his services as founder of the Palestine Exploration Fund prove that neither his knowledge nor his industry during a long career has been limited to one subject. It is announced that subscriptions to the fund are to be paid in to the London and County Bank, Hanover Square Branch; and we can scarcely doubt that the many earnest lovers of music who know how valuable have been the results of Mr. Grove's exertions will take this opportunity of substantially expressing their high appreciation of his disinterested devotion to the cause.

On the 26th ult., at the New Cross Public Hall, Mr. Henry Gadsby's Cantata, "The Lord of the Isles," was performed by the Wickham Park Musical Society before a large and appreciative audience. The vocalists on the occasion were Miss Adela Vernon (Edith), Mrs. Bradshawe McKay (Isabel), Mr. Gerard Coventry (the Lord of the Isles), and Mr. James Sauvage (Robert Bruce), all of whom sang the music allotted to them with much effect, Mrs. McKay and Mr. Sauvage being particularly successful. The two members of the choir who undertook the parts of Allaster and the Abbot may also be congratulated upon the manner in which they rendered their music. The work occupied the whole evening, a division being made after the chorus, "Merrily, merrily bounds the bark;" the second part opening with the tenor scena, "'Tis night," making the concert one of model length. Several numbers were encored, amongst which may be enumerated Bruce's scena, "O holy man," the chorus above mentioned, Isabel's Prayer, the duet which follows, and the Victory Chorus, "The sun gleam'd low," loud and prolonged applause greeting the conclusion of the performance. The manner in which the choruses were sung reflected great credit on Mr. Eaton Faning, who conducted with conspicuous ability.

The prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera for the coming season announces but little to interest those who look upon an opera-house as anything beyond an evening lounge for the aristocracy. One novelty is indeed almost promised, Paladilhe's Opera "Suzanne," but this is included with Gounod's "Mireille," Hérold's "Pré aux clercs," Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," and Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra;" "at least two" of which works, it is said, will be produced. The company is exceedingly strong, and includes the names of Madame Albani, Madame Adelina Patti, Mdlles. Alwina Valleria, Turolla, and Bauermeister; Madame Scalchi, Signori Gayarré, Marini, and Nicolini; M. Maurel; Signori Graziani, Cotogni, and Ugotti; and M. Lassalle. The first appearances are Mdlles. Morini and Lenari (soprani), Mdlle. Peppina Malvezzi (contralto), M. Engel and Signor Orloff (tenori), and Signor Sante Athos (baritone). The season commences on the 13th inst., and after the first week there are to be regularly four opera nights in each week. Signori Vianesi and Bevignani are named as "conductors, composers, and directors of the music," though what they are to "compose" during the season we are at a loss to understand.

The proposal to place a new organ in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, by subscription, is one which we are assured will be cordially welcomed, not only by the many eminent local musicians whose connection with the noble old building may make them take a special interest in the subject, but by all who have the advancement of music at heart. The Mayor and Sheriff of Norwich, the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Suffield, K.C.B., Lord Stafford, and several influential gentlemen have already given liberal donations towards the fund; and the Committee appointed for carrying out the project includes Dr. F. E. Gladstone (Organist of Norwich Cathedral), Dr. Bunnett (Organist to the Norwich Festivals), Dr. Horace Hill, and other well-known musicians, whose names are a sufficient guarantee that the whole of the money collected will be worthily applied. Subscriptions are to be sent to the Mayor of Norwich, or to Messrs. W. E. Hansell, William Heaver, and Charles E. Noverre, Honorary Secretaries to the Fund, Norwich.

The Directors of the Royal Caledonian Asylum entertained the "Society of Old Caledonians" at a soirée on the 3rd ult., in the large hall of the building. J. Lawrie, Esq., presided. An excellent programme of music was provided, including glees, vocal and instrumental solos, &c. Mr. Mansfield (Conductor) performed a fantasia on Scotch airs on the violin in excellent style, and Mr. Beech gave a clever performance on the piccolo of "Corn Riggs" with variations. Miss Davis sang "Jessie's Dream" and "Olivia" with great taste, the pianoforte accompaniments being skilfully played by Miss Mansfield. The Chairman sang "A man's a man for a' that" and "When the kye come hame"; Mr. Ogg, "The Village Blacksmith"; and Mr. M'Leod a clever comic song. The entertainment concluded with "Auld lang syne."

The first Concert of the Highbury Vocal Union was given at Langham Hall on Monday evening, the 1st ult., under the direction of its Conductor, Mr. Rayfield Leamer. The first part opened with Randegger's anthem, "Praise the Lord," followed by Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The solos were admirably sustained by Miss Adela Falkland, Miss Kate Lawrence, Mr. Lovett King, and Mr. John Barton. The second part consisted of ballads. In addition to the soloists above named, Miss Savage, Messrs. Gifford, Emslie, and Bristol took part. The accompaniments were excellently played by Miss Annie Ackerman in the first part, and Mr. Lovett King and Signor Odoardo Barri in the second. The Concert was highly successful.

A Concert was given at the Mansion House, under the superintendence of the Deputation in relation to the National Training School for Music, by the Guildhall Orchestral Society, on Saturday, the 13th ult. The programme included Overture, "William Tell"; Bizet's Grand Suite for Orchestra, "L'Arlésienne"; Goetz's Symphony in F; Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro giojoso (pianoforte, Miss Victoria Bath); Gavotte for Strings (Weist Hill), &c. The vocal portion was rendered by Miss Giulia Welmi (who replaced Madame Emma Beasley, indisposed), Miss Josephine Cravino, and Mr. Stedman (in place of Mr. Seligmann). The accompanist was Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Weist Hill conducted.

The ninety-seventh Monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was given at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 19th ult. Spohr's sacred Cantata, "God, Thou art great," was the principal feature of the Concert, the solos being well rendered by Miss Jannette Adam, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Arthur Baxter. Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" was also given, the solo being taken by Miss Agnes Ross. Songs and duets were contributed by the above named, Mr. Arthur Weston and Mr. W. Lloyd. The singing of the choir in Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and Gounod's "Ave verum" was much admired. Mr. J. H. Maunder accompanied, and Mr. Henry Baker conducted.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its 134th consecutive Monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday, the 5th ult., the programme, as usual during Lent, being of a sacred character. The choir showed to great advantage in "O Father, whose almighty power" ("Judas"), "And the glory" ("Messiah"), and in Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" (solo, Miss Bessie Spear). The soloists, Madame Marie Belval, Miss Bessie Spear, and Mr. R. F. Roberts were all very warmly applauded by a large audience. Miss Farr, Miss Edith Mahon, and Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte; Messrs. Garside and Monday conducted.

Mr. T. S. Puddicombe gave a Concert of an excellent character at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New Road, on Thursday evening, the 18th ult., assisted by the following artists: Madame Edith Wynne, Miss Matilda Roby, Miss Martha Harries, Miss Lizzie Evans, Messrs. Henry Guy, Arthur Thomas, James Sauvage, Lucas Williams, James Budd, and F. Edmonds, all of whom were highly appreciated. The duties of accompanist were performed by the bénéficiaire, who also contributed three pianoforte soli, including one of his own composition. The attendance was exceedingly numerous.

A Concert by the pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read was given at the Institution on the 12th ult., Major R. Berkeley in the chair. Amongst the most effective items in a well-selected programme may be mentioned two organ solos, the first by Mr. James Hawes, and the second by Mr. J. T. Price; a Quartet (composed by Mr. Barnes), "But Thy loving kindness," and Haydn's "Spirit Song," excellently sung by Miss Rose Seaman. The performance was, as usual, under the direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, Professor of Music at the Society's Schools.

A Concert in aid of the St. Peter's (Windmill Street) Choir Fund was given at Langham Hall on the 16th ult. The programme was a varied one, and gave much satisfaction to the audience, Miss Hebe Barlow being greatly applauded in her two songs. Mdlle. Rudersdorff, Miss A. Cox, Miss E. Reed, Mrs. Sicklemore, Mr. Humm, Mr. W. Rendell, Mr. W. Paul, and Mr. H. G. Froome contributed songs, glees, &c.; and the pianoforte-playing of Mdlles. R. and M. Caplazzi was much admired. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. A. Dorey, who also performed a pianoforte duet with Mr. W. Clayton.

Professor W. H. Monk gave a Lecture on "Some Predecessors of Bach and Handel" at the London Institution on the 11th ult. The lecture was illustrated by interesting examples from the works of Carissimi, Salvator Rosa, Rossi, Pergolesi, and Stradella, and the "Stabat Mater" of Astorga was, with the exception of one duet, performed in its entirety. Miss F. Norman, Mrs. W. Bowles, Miss Spencer-Jones, and Mr. E. Wharton contributed the vocal portion of the illustrations; and Mr.

W. S. Hoyte played Scarlatti's Cat's Fugue and a Toccata and Fugue by J. S. Bach.

We understand that Madame Lemmens-Sherrington proposes to make a farewell tour through some portions of the country during the coming autumn, and that she will take the opportunity of introducing to public life her two daughters, who have for some time been studying singing under "Jenny Lind."

The members of the Christ Church (Old Kent Road) Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season on the 9th ult. Mr. W. H. Cummings's Cantata, "The Fairy Ring," formed the first part of the programme, the solo parts being rendered by Madame Norman, Miss Edith Maas, Mr. H. Eastwood, and Mr. G. Mepstead. Mr. H. Campbell, R.A.M., presided at the pianoforte, Mr. T. M. Clarke (Organist of Lambeth Parish Church) at the harmonium, and Mr. Hall conducted. The second part was miscellaneous.

In accordance with a resolution passed by the members at the Annual Meeting of the London Gregorian Choral Association, when the Right Hon. the Earl Beauchamp presided, two cleric and two lay Vice-Presidents have been elected by the Committee, viz., the Lord Bishop of Bedford and the Rev. Thos. Helmore, M.A., and the Earl of S. Germains and Hon. C. L. Wood. The date fixed for the Annual Festival is Thursday, May 13, when the preacher will be the Right Rev. Walsham How, Bishop Suffragan of Bedford.

Since the first announcement of Mr. Ganz's Orchestral Afternoon Concerts, to which we drew attention in our last number, we find that Mr. Herbert Reeves (son of Mr. Sims Reeves) has been engaged, and will make his first appearance in public at these Concerts. We need scarcely say how much interest will be felt in the appeal of a young artist who bears a name so long endeared to English audiences. Mr. Sims Reeves will also sing at three of Mr. Ganz's Concerts during the season.

In Congregations holden respectively on March 4 and March 20, 1880, the following gentlemen were admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Music in the University of Oxford: Frederic William Clarke, Queen's College, and 7, Derwent Road, South Penge Park, London, S.E.; John Maude Crament, unattached, and of 100, Redcliffe Gardens, South Kensington, London, S.W.

The annual Lenten Service took place at St. Stephen's Church, Lewisham (of which Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., is Organist), on Saturday, the 20th ult. The Oratorio of "Christus" was given with full orchestral accompaniment, the tenor solos being entrusted to Mr. Hanson, of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. G. C. Martin presided at the organ, and Mr. Jordan conducted.

On Tuesday, the 16th ult., a Service of Praise was given by the Choral Class in connection with the Tottenham High Cross Congregational Church, assisted by the Misses Crome, under the conductorship of Mr. Geo. Shinn, Mus. Bac., Cantab (Organist of Brixton Church), who performed two organ solos during the evening. The proceeds will be devoted to the Organ Fund.

An excellent Concert was given in the City Temple on the 16th ult., by the City Temple Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Minshall. The vocalists were Miss Lizzie Evans, Miss Woodhatch, and Mr. Hebditch; and the instrumentalists—violin, Miss Kate Chaplin; pianoforte, Miss Jessie Morrison; organ, Mr. Minshall.

At a Concert to be given by Mr. Alderson's Amateur Choir at the Assembly Rooms, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, on the 16th inst., Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" and Henry Smart's Cantata for ladies' voices, "The Fishermaidens," are announced for performance. The Conductor is Mr. T. Albion Alderson.

A Cantata entitled "Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni," composed by Dr. Bridge, the libretto by Miss Troutbeck, will be performed by the Highbury Philharmonic Society at the last concert of the present season, May 31. The work will be published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

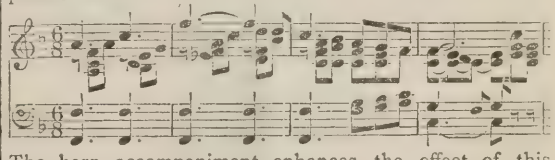
Madame Patey will commence a six weeks provincial tour in October next. Our admirable English violoncellist, Mr. Edward Howell, is engaged as one of the troupe, with Mr. Thouless as solo pianist and conductor.

The late Dr. Bexfield's Oratorio, "Israel Restored," which was performed at the Norwich Festival of 1852, will be produced at the Albert Hall on the 15th inst, under the direction of Mr. William Carter.

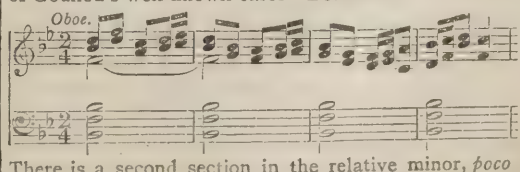
REVIEWS.

The First Christmas Morn. A Biblical Pastoral. Words by the Rev. S. J. Stone. Music by Henry Leslie. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This work, as our readers will remember, was the most important novelty produced at the recent Brighton Festival. The choice of the word "Pastoral" in preference to Cantata was doubtless not made unadvisedly; it at once stamps the nature of the work, and we look for simplicity of outline rather than for elaborate contrapuntal writing; for melodic charm rather than for massively constructed choruses. Let us hasten to say that the composer has been well served by his librettist, for the Rev. Mr. Stone's lines are not only thoughtful and suggestive in themselves, but seem to invite musical treatment. The further consideration of the book may be fitly taken in conjunction with that of the music. The work opens with an introduction of ninety-seven bars, Andante sostenuto, in C, 3-4, intended to suggest the night-watch of the Shepherds. Its general character is that of sadness and disquiet, though the phrases are flowing, and by no means unmelodious. The corno inglese is employed with charming effect. At the ninety-eighth bar the key changes to the minor and the time to Allegro moderato, C, the male chorus shortly afterwards commencing to the words "It is night, still is night." The gloomy character of this is maintained (with some florid work in the accompaniment) until an impassioned unisonal phrase, "Do we cling to a phantom for aye," leads to a fine burst in the major key, Alla marcia, "Nay! He comes, for Jehovah hath sworn." This more jubilant tone is maintained until the voices cease, but the orchestra shows a subsequent reaction, the music dying away sadly at the close. Some portions of this movement may remind the listener of Mendelssohn's "Antigone." No. 3 is a Recitative and Solo for the Angel (soprano). A stately phrase allotted to the wind and strings alternately—the trombones being here used for the first time—ushers in the celestial visitant. Mr. Leslie's setting of the familiar message is almost as simple as that of Handel. But there is nothing Handelian in the solo, "Lone and far the echoes ring," which commences with the following melodious phrase:—



The harp accompaniment enhances the effect of this suave and flowing movement. No. 4 is, as may be supposed, the "Chorus of Angels," which is in D, 3-4. The new key is reached by an inversion of the German sixth, given out by the brass. The Chorus itself, for female voices, is simple and purely homophonic, the harp again having an important share in the accompaniment. Then we have another brief soprano solo, solemn, dignified, and church-like, "Fear not, the word will never die." The succeeding Chorus of shepherds "Now to Bethlehem let us go" has this quaintly pastoral theme, rather suggestive of Gounod's well-known carol "Bethlehem":—



There is a second section in the relative minor, poco più lento, and then a return to B flat Allegro con fuoco. This latter part of the Chorus is worked up with much vigour, the voice parts being more dispersed than in any previous portion of the work and the orchestration fiery and brilliant. But at the close the pastoral motive is heard again, and the movement ends in the quietest way. Now comes the gem of the entire composition, a Recitative and Air for the Virgin Mary (contralto). The text "She pondered in her heart" is prefixed to this number, and Mr. Leslie's manifest endeavour to render the music thoroughly suggestive of Mary's meditative nature has been completely successful. The air is based upon this most expressive melody:—

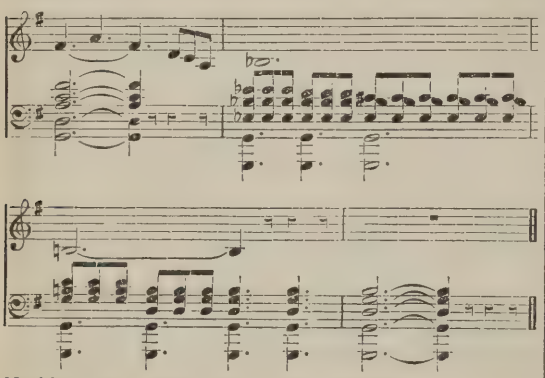
but its progress is broken with excellent effect by snatches of recitative as the current of the singer's ideas changes and rechanges. The close is so striking as to merit quotation:—



Nothing now remains but to close the work in an appropriate manner, and this is done by a Hymn or Chorus of People, "Sing for Israel's golden morn," in which mixed voices are employed for the only time. A brief prelude for the organ, in which the old ecclesiastical phrase—adopted by so many composers, is once more utilised, leads to the first verse of the hymn. Four bars of interlude are followed by the second verse with increased orchestration and varied harmonies. Another and longer interlude, and then comes the third verse, fff, in unison, the full orchestra and organ accompanying in free counterpoint. The voices break into harmony at the seventh line, and the word "Hosanna," four times repeated, brings the work to a majestic close in the same key that it commenced, namely, C major. It will be gathered from this imperfect description of Mr. Leslie's Pastoral that it is characterised by sound musicianship and such pleasing effects as may be produced by simple means, rather than by any startling originality either in the design or the details. If any look for strange harmonies and obscure phraseology needing analysis and elucidation, they will be greatly disappointed with "The First Christmas Morn." The composer has evidently considered the tastes and requirements of the majority of music-lovers, and not the predilections of those who profess an advanced eclecticism. Two circumstances will militate against the ready adoption of the work by small choral societies. These are the subdivision of each section of the chorus, male and female, into four parts, and the superabundance of high notes for the first trebles and the first tenors, particularly for the latter. Of course Mr. Leslie's own force would make light of these difficulties, but they proved too much for the Brighton choir at the first performance. Especial reference must be made to the very artistic treatment of the orchestra throughout the work. The composer does not crowd his score nor make any unnecessary display of polyphony. But his feeling for colouring is uniformly felicitous, and a study of the vocal score will convey but a feeble idea of the effects of many passages in actual performance.

Denkmäler der Tonkunst.

The Works of Palestrina. Edited by H. Bellermann. Vol. I., Sixty-six four-part Motets.

Te Deum. By A. F. Urio. Edited by F. Chrysander. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Giovanni Pierluigi Palestrina occupies an unique position in the gallery of musical celebrities. The middle of the sixteenth century may be taken as the termination of an important epoch in the art and the commencement of a new era, the duration of which ended with Haydn and the inauguration of the melodic school. The musical glory of Flanders had culminated with Josquin Deprès and Roland de Lattre, and the centre of gravity was for a time to be shifted to Rome. It is as an Art reformer that we have chief reason to feel gratitude towards Palestrina, for had it not been for him a grievous interdict would have been pronounced, the blighting influence of which might have retarded progress for ages. Ecclesiastical music at that date might be fitly characterised as an unholy alliance betwixt pedantry and profanity. It is difficult to say whether we should feel the greater astonishment at the complacency with which the sacred text was blended with secular and often indecent airs, or at the equal lack of reverence shown in permitting the words of the Mass to serve as the groundwork of meaningless canons and other contrapuntal puzzles. It will be unnecessary to repeat here the oft-told narrative of the circumstances under which Palestrina composed his "Missa Papæ Marcelli." Let it suffice that by this work he demonstrated to the ecclesiastical authorities that a return to the primitive faux bourdon was not inevitable; but that Art stripped of all meretricious surroundings might still walk hand in hand with Religion. The service he thereby rendered to both cannot be estimated by ordinary calculations. The title of "Father of Church Music" may be as appropriately bestowed upon him as that of "Father of the Symphony" upon Haydn. Like the modern master, he lived to a good old age and wrote unceasingly. The number of his Masses, Motets, Litanies, Magnificats, Psalms, and Madrigals would reach a total of several hundred. Dr. Chrysander's collection is to be completed in sixteen volumes. The first volume contains thirty-six Motets for use on the various festivals of the ecclesiastical year, originally published at Rome in 1563, and another collection of thirty, first published at Venice, 1581. Unless however the editor accelerates the issue of the work he will be outpaced by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, whose splendid subscription edition of Palestrina—uniform with their Handel and Bach—is proceeding steadily. Eight books are already published, and it is estimated that the edition will be completed in about thirty books, the last of which will be in the hands of the subscribers by the year 1894, the tercentenary of Palestrina's death.

The reprint of Urio's Te Deum is the first of a series entitled "Original Sources of some of Handel's Works." The next volume will include a Magnificat by Erba, and a Serenata by Stradella. It is known to musicians that Handel did not hesitate to avail himself, not only of phrases but of entire movements from the works of his predecessors and contemporaries, and it will be interesting to have placed within our reach those scores from which he condescended to borrow his ideas. In the present instance he has succeeded in immortalising a composer who would otherwise have been swept from remembrance. Fétis simply remarks, concerning Urio, that he was chapelmaster at Venice near the close of the seventeenth century, and that he published a work entitled "Salmi Concertati," at Bologna, 1697. His Te Deum is not even mentioned. Why Handel should have selected it as suitable material for wholesale plunder it is difficult to say. Suffice it that in his "Dettingen Te Deum," and in the oratorio "Saul," we find passages without number identical with others in Urio's work, even down to the scoring. Did space permit quotations might be given in support of this; but the student anxious to gain an insight into the ideas respecting artistic honesty prevalent in Handel's day can judge for himself by glancing through this volume. Let it be distinctly understood that the majestic effects to be found in the music of the Saxon master are almost invariably his own. He has but taken the dry bones and endowed them with life and power. Of course his method of procedure would not be tolerated at the present time, but it is probable that he was no more troubled by qualms of conscience than was Bach in utilising the treasures of Lutheran psalmody in his motets and settings of the Passion. But in all respects the two cases stand upon different ground. Bach's action was open and palpable to all the world, and his successors, even to the present day, have not hesitated to adopt similar means for gaining effect when fancy or expediency suggested such a course. Handel's pilfering, on the other hand, was done without acknowledgment, and its full extent is perhaps even yet unknown. Our admiration for the master must not interfere with our condemnation of principles so wholly at variance with the first notions of artistic honour and integrity.

Mass in C; for Four Voices and Organ. Composed by E. Silas. Op. 62. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

At the great International Competition of Sacred Music held in Belgium in 1866 this Mass obtained, amongst seventy-six competitors of twelve different nations, the first prize. We have, of course, no means of judging the merits of any of the unsuccessful compositions, but can conscientiously say that, apart from the excellent artistic workmanship throughout the Mass before us, each movement has received a treatment so truly in sympathy with the text as to warrant us in assigning a high place to Mr. Silas as a sacred writer. The pure devotional colouring which alone can make music felt as well as admired has obviously ruled the composer throughout his setting of the words; and his contrapuntal power therefore is shown only where it will legitimately aid in intensifying the effect upon the listener. The "Kyrie" commences, not with the notes, but with the calm feeling of the opening to Beethoven's Mass in the same key. The bold theme in the relative minor, given out by the tenors and answered by the altos, is excellently contrasted with the placid character of the first subject; and although this fugal portion of the movement is not developed at any great length, we have some thoroughly good and effective part-writing before the return to the original theme. The jubilant character of the "Gloria" is appropriately preserved to the words, "et in terra pax," which are breathed out in perfect consonance with their peaceful import, and the "Gratias agimus"—commencing with the four voices unaccompanied—in E flat major, leads most effectively to a close on the dominant of G minor, in which key the "Qui tollis" starts, with a melodious bass solo, the following "Quoniam tu solus" bursting forth in the tonic major, with the same subject as the "Gloria in excelsis," the movement ending with some fine bold harmonies, afterwards floridly accompanied, to the "Cum Sancto Spiritu." The "Credo" is in every respect a remarkable movement. The "Et incarnatus" is set to a lovely subject in A flat major—with an effective figure in the accompaniment—and the "Crucifixus," in the tonic minor, is followed by some vigorous and clever writing, a good point being gained by the return to C, the key in which the "Credo" opens, for the commencement of the "Et in Spiritum Sanctum." The short fugal movement set to the "Sanctus" leads well to the "Benedictus," the solo parts in which are extremely melodious, and well contrasted with the brief choral portions. If well sung, the "Benedictus" should be the most popular number in the Mass, although, musically speaking, we are by no means disposed to regard it as the best. The "Agnus Dei," commencing in C minor, has an excellent change into the tonic major for the "Dona nobis," this final movement containing some remarkably fine points, the concluding sustained notes for the voice parts, unaccompanied, ending the work most effectively. We have preferred to notice the Mass apart from the "Graduale," "Offertorium," and "Tantum Ergo" (which are written, of course, for special purposes); but we may mention that these movements are thoroughly worthy of the work of which they indeed form a part, the "Offertorium," especially, including some charming writing. Being now published in the well-known octavo form, there can be no doubt that this Mass will receive the attention it deserves; and we shall be glad to find that the favourable opinion pronounced upon it in Belgium will be thoroughly endorsed in England.

A History of Music, for the use of Young Students. By W. S. Rockstro. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

We quite agree with Mr. Rockstro, that "without some knowledge of the History of Music we can neither learn to estimate the merits of the great masters at their true value, nor enter fully into their spirit." Beethoven used to say that his music spoke for itself, and that anybody who could not understand it should not perform it; but there can be little doubt that the player who can thoroughly enter into the mind of a composer can render his works with much more dramatic power than a mere accurate reader of the notes; and nothing can more conduce to this result than an acquaintance with the inner life and surroundings of the tone-poets of the world. The work before us is evidently not intended to replace the standard Histories of Music, but rather to prepare the young student for the perusal of more elaborate books on the subject; and considered in this light, we can award high praise to Mr. Rockstro's Treatise. A very fair sketch is given of the "Music of the Antients," and of what is termed "Gregorian Music"; a little explanation, however, being necessary, we think, of the word "Tone," a term which we know puzzles many young students. A "Gregorian Tone," it is said, "is nothing more than an exceedingly simple 'Tone' for the Psalms, of great antiquity, written in one or other of the first eight Modes, and therefore named 'First,' 'Second,' or 'Third Tone,' as the case may be." But then the pupil may say, "We know perfectly well what a Mode is, by your description, but what is a Tone? The dawn of Counterpoint and the invention of the Time Table are clearly treated upon, and the rise and progress of instrumental music occupies as much space as could possibly be spared in a work of such small dimensions. Room is found for some specimens from the compositions of the early writers; and some very good biographies are given of those composers who may be said, by their individual effect upon the art, to have been "representative men." At the end of the book we have some "Questions for Examination," the answers to which are to be given by reference to a well-prepared Chronological Index. This will compel the student to recapitulate the contents of the work; and we promise him that if he can satisfactorily answer only the majority of these queries, he will have acquired a very fair knowledge of the History of Music, to which he will, no doubt, find a pleasure in adding at a later period of his career.

A New and Improved Catechism of the Rudiments of Music. Compiled by William Buels. [Duff and Stewart.]

The object of compiling this little work has been, the author tells us in his preface, "to enable students, not only of the pianoforte, but of music in its various branches, to arrive at a correct knowledge of the subject without referring to any musical instrument, a plan hitherto too much disregarded." There is doubtless much truth in the remark that the teaching of the elements of music apart from any instrument is but little thought of. The young pupil is generally ruled by the pianoforte keyboard; so much so, indeed, that (as we have found by experience) intervals can rarely be calculated with any degree of accuracy, and we have even found difficulty in convincing juvenile students that there are not four black notes in the key of A flat major. The whole of the explanations in this book are exceedingly clear, and we have pleasure in recommending it for class teaching. We could wish that Mr. Buels had adopted the system of linking the major key with its tonic, instead of its relative, minor, because we are certain that this is the only method by which correct ideas can be gained on this important subject; but the conventional arrangement will no doubt linger very much longer, and in a small Catechism like the one before us, it is perhaps not good to be too innovative.

A Nursery Rhyme. Song. Words by Christina Rosetti.
Constant Love. Song. Poetry by E. G. B.
My love, mine own. Song.
Composed by Francis Hueffer.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These charming musical trifles come to us like Spring flowers after a dreary Winter. "A Nursery Rhyme," although simple in the extreme, bears the trace of an artist's hand throughout; and "Constant Love" is an earnest outpouring of truthful passion, in which the refinement of the musician is in such perfect sympathy with the poet that, but for the initials of the author, we should have thought the two had been identical. But best of the three is the last on our list, "My love, mine own," a melodious theme in C minor, colouring the words with remarkable fidelity. Amongst the many beautiful points in this song we may mention the concluding bars, in which the phrase in C minor is repeated in a lengthened form, and ends in E flat major. If good vocal music can force its way through the crowd in these days of rapid manufacture, we may predict for these unpretentious songs the attention they undoubtedly merit.

Gondellied, for the Pianoforte. Composed by Charles Trew. [Neumeyer and Co.]

The rhythm of the Gondoliers' song is so fascinating to composers that we can scarcely wonder at the immense number of pianoforte pieces based upon the conventional strains of these musical boatmen; although perhaps it may be said—as with "Slumber songs," "Hunting songs," and others of this class—we have now had almost enough of them. Mr. Trew's "Gondellied" is elegantly written, an obstinate figure in the bass lending an interest to a melody which, without this addition, would sound somewhat commonplace. The passages are graceful and by no means difficult; and pianists who can phrase the subject as the composer intends, and give due effect to the characteristic accompaniment, may safely add this "Gondellied" to the many pieces of the same name which they have, no doubt, in their portfolio.

The Three Singers. Song. Poetry by Longfellow. Music by Berthold Tours.
[Boosey and Co.]

At the Ballad Concerts this song has been twice sung, with the greatest success, by Madame Antoinette Sterling. But a song which will create a decisive effect with a popular audience in a concert-room will not always bear a critical examination when removed from these surrounding influences; and we are glad therefore that our own calmly considered verdict is in this case thoroughly in accord with that of the public. The varied shades of feeling in Longfellow's charming verses are most sympathetically coloured in the musical setting. The contrast of style in the three songs gives much interest to a composition which propounds most eloquently a great truth; and although we cannot disguise the fact that an inferior vocalist will make but little of a song demanding not only voice but mind for its due interpretation, there can be little doubt that a singer who can thoroughly feel the words will make her hearers feel them. We may say that a harmonium accompaniment is published, which, if well played, would we think materially enhance the effect of the song.

A Selection of Original Chants and Hymn Tunes; also the Responses to the Commandments, Nicene Creed, &c. By the Rev. C. B. Walton.
[Harrison and Harrison, Birmingham.]

Mr. Walton has divided the Creed, Offertory Sentences, Sanctus, and "Gloria in excelsis" into verses, pointed in the ordinary way for chanting. This will perhaps give composers of simple services a new idea. Beyond this we do not attach much importance to this work. The melody of the first hymn is of a good manly type, but when we tell our readers that these chords, A, A, C♯, G, and B, G, D, A immediately follow each other, they will not be surprised that we do not appreciate the harmonies. On the first page is printed the Choir rules of St. James' Church, Ogley Hay, and Brownhills, which are excellent, and will probably be read with interest by choirmasters.

The Office for the Holy Communion. Set to music by Sidney R. Coles. [Weekes and Co.]

This music does not excite our interest very much, although it is not without some redeeming points. Our readers must decide for themselves as to whether or not it is advisable to have three or four settings of the Kyrie in one service. We must be allowed to say that Mr. Cole's time-word, "lightly," is a little obscure. The music to the Credo, as well as to the other portions of the Communion Service, is of a very easy stamp, and though not tuneful, is yet not unappropriate in character. The Sanctus is as simple as possible, and effective withal. We are sorry we cannot speak very highly of the other portions.

The Congregational Psalmist. Tunes for "Children's Worship." [Hodder and Stoughton; Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The tunes in this book are, as a rule, very suitable for the purpose for which they are intended. A few words from the Preface will show our readers that the editor, the Rev. Henry Allon, is peculiarly fitted for the task, and we think that, upon the whole, he has made a very judicious selection of tunes. "Whatever seemed best to express the sentiment of a hymn, whether for an infant school or for a senior class of young men and women, has been adopted, irrespective of the source whence it was derived, or the school of music to which it belonged. The supreme purpose of music in worship is to give expression and intensity to devotional words."

FOREIGN NOTES.

On the 27th of February last the Berlin Wagner Society celebrated the anniversary of its foundation by a festive performance of some of the Bayreuth reformer's music, including the first act (without stage accessories) of "Walküre," Herr Niemann, the celebrated Wagner tenor, having undertaken the part of Siegmund. The Emperor William, who was present, expressed himself much pleased with the performance, adding, with an allusion to the Nibelungen representations at Bayreuth, "I believed in the importance of the work then; but this time it has fairly taken hold of me." We need scarcely add that the Wagner party is greatly elated at this imperial dictum, and that hopes are entertained of the famous Tetralogy being, at last, produced on the operatic stage of the German capital. Owing to the increased activity of the Bayreuth Patronat-Verein there have been numerous additions lately to the list of members of that Society, and the question as to fixing the date of the first performance of Wagner's latest music-drama "Parsifal" is, in consequence, again under consideration.

The activity displayed by the Hamburg Stadt-Theater in matters operatic, under the able direction of Herr Pollini, is truly surprising. After the recent performance there of the complete series of Mozart's operas, a repetition of the entire Nibelungen Tetralogy has already taken place, and will be followed by the production, in chronological order, of the whole of Wagner's operas, commencing with "Rienzi."

Herr Weissheimer's opera, "Meister Martin und seine Gesellen," achieved a genuine success on the occasion of its first production at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater on the 6th ult. The libretto is founded on the well known tale by C. T. A. Hoffmann. The new opera is likewise in course of preparation at the theatres of Munich, Hamburg, and Nuremberg.

C. M. von Weber's early opera, "Sylvana," has lately been performed with extraordinary success at the Theatre of Antwerp, under the direction of M. Pezzani. The local journals are unanimous in their praise of the merits of the work, and express their surprise at its having been so long neglected by the managers of operatic institutions.

Among the musical entertainments afforded by German watering places, those given by the Cur-Orchester of Wiesbaden, under the able direction of Herr Louis Lüstner, occupy a foremost place. We have received a number of programmes of concerts of that institution which have taken place during the last few months (some of them being specified in the column reserved for that purpose), all of which bear witness to the high artistic tendencies of their zealous conductor.

A hitherto unpublished composition by Michael Haydn (the brother of Joseph) has been issued by the firm of Bössenecker, of Regensburg, under the title of "Oelberg Gesänge" (Mount of Olives Songs), for soprano and bass, accompanied by two violins, viola, two horns, double-bass, and organ.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has, it is said, been nominated musical director of the orchestra of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen.

At a recent performance of Verdi's "Aïda" at the Viennese Opera, Madame Pauline Lucca achieved a great success in the title-rôle, which she sang for the first time in the German language.

The Leipzig Signale mentions the fact that one of the most active and useful members of the corps de ballet of the Imperial Opera at Vienna, Herr Destefano, is eighty-two years old. Despite his great age, he daily attends the rehearsals, and takes a leading part at every performance.

The inauguration of the Beethoven monument at Vienna is announced to take place on the 23rd of next month. Among the items included in the festive programme may be mentioned a grand Concert to be given by the Viennese Philharmonic Society, in which, it is hoped, Franz Liszt will play one of the immortal composer's compositions.

An opera by Anton Dvorák, entitled "Wanda," is about to be produced at the Prague National Theatre. The same work of the rising Bohemian composer will also be brought out shortly at the Imperial Viennese Opera.

Ponchielli's opera "Gioconda" was recently produced, in a revised form, at the Theatre La Scala of Milan, and was very favourably received.

A musical Conservatoire and Philharmonic Society has been founded at San Luis de Potosi, in Mexico, under the direction of Señor Melesio Morales.

Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" was performed on February 18, at New York, by the Symphony Society, with the co-operation of the choirs of the "Arion" and Oratorio Societies of that city, this having been the first introduction of the work to an American audience.

Madame Albani has completed her engagement for a series of impersonations at the Brussels Opera, where the eminent vocalist met with an enthusiasm fully compensating her for her recent experiences in an opposite direction at Milan.

Alfredo Catalani's opera "Elda" was recently performed with much success at the Teatro Rezio of Turin, the new work of the young Italian maestro being, in the opinion of our correspondent, one of great merit, especially as regards the choral and orchestral portions.

Dr. Paul Mendelssohn Bartholdy, the second son of the composer, lately died at Berlin at the age of thirty-nine. The deceased was a partner in the well-known colour manufacturing firm of Mendelssohn and Martius.

At Venice, died, at the age of seventy-nine, Antonio Angeleri, much esteemed as a professor of pianoforte-playing.

Albert Sowinski, pianist and composer of some reputation, died on the 5th ult., at Paris, aged seventy-seven. He was a descendant of an ancient Polish family, and, like many others of his unfortunate countrymen, had taken refuge in the French capital after the insurrection of 1830, in which he had taken part. Sowinski was the author of a French translation of Schindler's "Life of Beethoven," as well as of a "Dictionnaire biographique des musiciens polonais et slaves."

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Conservatoire (February 22): Symphony in F (Beethoven); Pater noster, unaccompanied chorus (Meyerbeer); Overture, "Giaour" (Th. Gorwy); Chorus from "Armide" (Lulli); Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn). Concert Populaire (February 22): Symphony in D, No. 45 (Haydn); Offertory (Gounod); Violin Concerto (Beethoven); "Kermesse" (Godard); Overture, "Freischütz" (Weber). Châtelet Concert (February 22): Scotch Symphony (Mendelssohn); Fragments from Fourth Symphony (Tchaïkowsky); Tarantelle for flute and clarionet (Saint-Saëns); Andante and Variations from Sestet (Beethoven); "L'Arlésienne" (Bizet). Concert Populaire (February 29): Music to Goethe's "Faust" (Schumann). Châtelet Concert (February 29): Symphony, B minor (Beethoven); Second Violin Concerto (Max Bruch); Scènes Symphoniques (Dubois); Violin Suite (Raff); Fragments from "Dalila" (Ch. Lefebvre); Danse espagnoles (Sarasate); Overture, "Francs Juges" (Berlioz). Châtelet Concert (March 7): Symphonie fantastique (Berlioz); Divertissement from "Le Roi de Lahore" (Massenet); Concerto for Pianoforte (Marie Jaëll); Danse macabre (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "La Forza del Destino" (Verdi). Conservatoire (March 14): Choral Symphony (Beethoven); Rondo and Bourrée from Suite in B minor (Bach); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber). Concert Populaire (March 14): Symphony in A (Beethoven); "Wallenstein's Death," symphonic poem (d'Indy); Pianoforte Concerto, A minor (Schumann); Entr'acte from "Traviata" (Verdi); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber). Châtelet Concert (March 14): "Le Tasse," Dramatic Symphony (B. Godard). Concert Populaire (March 21): Italian Symphony (Mendelssohn); Fragment from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Concerto romantique for violin (B. Godard); "L'Arlésienne" (Bizet); Overture, "Meistersinger" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (March 21): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz).

Berlin.—Sternscher-Gesangverein (February 20): Oratorio, "Samson" (Handel). Wagner Society (February 27): Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and first act from "Walküre" (Wagner). Singakademie (March 19): St. Matthew Passion-music (Bach), and (March 26) Oratorio "Der Tod Jesu" (Graun).

Dresden.—Conservatorium (March 3): Overture, "Coriolanus" (Beethoven). Quartet from "Idomeneo" (Mozart); Pianoforte Concerto in G major (Beethoven); Duet from "Jessonda" (Spohr); Prelude, in E major, by all the first violins (Bach); Symphony in A major (Mendelssohn). Tonkünstler-Verein (March 8): Trio in B flat major, Op. 97 (Beethoven); Sonata for pianoforte and violin in E minor (Wüllner); Ottet for strings, C major (Raff). Mannsfeldt's Sinfonie-Capelle (March 16): Overture, "Rienzi," Fragments from "Tannhäuser," Fragments from "Der fliegende Holländer," Albumblatt for violin, Entr'acte and Chorus from "Lohengrin," Selections from "Der Ring des Nibelungen" (Wagner).

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (February 12): Symphony in D minor (Volkmann); 114th Psalm (Mendelssohn); "Frühlingsbotschaft," for chorus and orchestra (Gade); Overture, Scherzo, and Finale (Schumann). Gewandhaus Concert (February 19): Overture, "Manfred" (Schumann); Air from "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); Pianoforte Concerto (Scharwenka); Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, for organ, arranged for pianoforte by Liszt (Bach); Symphony in D (Beethoven). Gewandhaus Concert (February 23): Symphony, "Hakon Jarl" (Reinecke); Recitative and Air from "Jessonda" (Spohr); Improvisata on a theme from Schumann's "Manfred" (Reinecke); Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Rubinstein); Pianoforte solos (Chopin, Liszt); Two Slavonic dances for orchestra (Dvorák).

Breslau.—Orchester-Verein (March 2): Overture, "Roman Carnival" (Berlioz); Violin Concerto (Viotti); Scènes poétiques (B. Godard): Romanze from Violin Concerto No. 6 (Spohr); Symphony in E flat major (Schumann). Orchester-Verein (March 16): Symphony in D major (Mozart); Air from "Alcina" (Handel); Variations from Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" (Goldmark); "Habanera" from "Carmen" (Bizet); Minuet from "L'Arlésienne" (Bizet); "Pavane" from "Etienne Marcel" (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn).

Cologne.—Concert Gesellschaft (February 24): Symphonic Prelude to Shakespeare's "Macbeth" (O. Klanwell); Violin Concerto (Spohr); Symphony, A major (Beethoven); Adagio and Finale from Violin Concerto in E major (Vieuxtemps); "La régine Avrillouse," for three-part female chorus (A. Krug); Vocal Soli. Concert-Gesellschaft (March 9): Overture, "Hamlet" (Gade); Marche Festivale (Gounod); Messe Solennelle, Sainte Cécile (Gounod); Ave Maria (Gounod); "Auf der Wacht," for orchestra (F. Hiller); Vocal numbers (Gounod).

Wiesbaden.—Curcapelle, conducted by Louis Lüstner (February 27): Overture, "Medea" (Cherubini); Chaconne (Handel); Symphony No. 1, D minor (Volkmann); Overture, "Leonore," No. 3 (Beethoven). Curcapelle (March 5): Overture, "St. Paul" (Mendelssohn); Violin Concerto, No. 2 (Raff); Scène d'amour from "Roméo et Juliette (Berlioz); Romance for Violin (Beethoven); Symphony, D minor (Schumann). Curcapelle (March 12): Fragments from "Prometheus" (Beethoven); Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini (Tchaïkowsky); Symphony in F (Rubinstein).

Turin.—Quartet Society: String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 3 (Beethoven); Pianoforte Trio, Op. 8 (Brahms); Pianoforte Solo, "Partita à la manière française" (Bach).

Baltimore.—Peabody Institute (February 7): String Trio, C major (Beethoven); Variations, "The Harmonious Blacksmith" (Handel); Pianoforte Trio, E flat major (Mozart). The same (February 14): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Fragments from "La Damnation de Faust" and "Roman Carnaval" (Berlioz); Songs (Rubinstein). The same (February 21): Symphony No. 2 (Saint Saëns); Sonata, Op. 57 (Beethoven); Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 1 (A. Dvorák); Songs (Schumann). Student's Concert of the same (February 28): String Trio, G major (Beethoven); Scene and Air from "Oberon;" Recitative and Air from "Freischütz" (Weber); Quintet, A major, Op. 114 (Schubert).

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—As a member of the Sacred Harmonic Society, I am desirous of calling attention to the following facts, which may be of especial interest to those of your readers who have given the Society their support.

The total number of performers at the Society's Concerts in Exeter Hall is between 500 and 550, but of these very few are members (or proprietors) of the Society, the Committee, in whose hands the election has always been vested, having allowed the number to diminish from about 160 to 73.

The property of the Society consists of a valuable library of choice and rare musical works, the most unique collection of its kind, together with a large répertoire of orchestral music.

The financial statement of the Society shows that the invested funds, accumulated in former years of prosperity, have been sold out and spent, together with the large annual income which the Society has enjoyed, as may be seen by comparing the present published reports with those of eight or ten years ago.

These facts, coupled with the probability of Exeter Hall being diverted to other purposes, seem to mark a crisis in the history of the Society, and to raise the question whether oratorio on a grand scale is destined to find refuge in the cathedral or the opera-house, or whether any home can be found for it in a more central position than the Albert Hall.

Now, Sir, a number of my fellow-members think with me that it is quite possible to make the Society self-supporting; and that equally brilliant musical results could be attained without such financial loss.

And, further, I think that a far less exclusive policy should have been adopted by the Committee as regards the election of new members, who might have infused fresh energy into the Society, and suggested reforms in keeping with the requirements of the times.

I believe your readers will agree with me that it would be a great calamity if the fine library were to be dispersed, or the Society broken up, without an effort being made to avert so serious a result.

I am sorry to have trespassed so far upon your space, but hope that, attention having been drawn to these facts, some suggestions may be offered which may result in a scheme for the maintenance or reorganisation of the work so long and gloriously carried on by this old Society.

I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

27 and 28, Little Trinity Lane, W. J. Bishop.

MOZART'S SUMMER-HOUSE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I read with pleasure in your number for March that "active support is being rendered by the German musical press to the plea advanced in our December number in favour of the preservation of 'Mozart's Summer-house,' forming part of the treasures of the Salzburg Institution, but exposed to the decaying effects of nature for want of a protective covering." In addition to the subscriptions I collected, and which have been already mentioned in the February number, I have the pleasure of forwarding you the subjoined:—

	Francs.
Madame Julie Gruber	5
Mdlle. la Princesse De Podenas, née Yermoloff	10
Lady Lamb	5

Yours faithfully,

Genoa. Sabilla Novello.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

Percy Vere.—We never recommend professors to our correspondents.

Wm. J. Hadden.—Application should be made to the Professor of the University at which you wish to take your degree.

William Brown.—It is probable that the desired information might be obtained by writing to the President, Lord Penrhyn.

Alfreton Hervey—We perfectly recollect the publication of the clever theoretical work mentioned by our correspondent, but have no knowledge of its author.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Aberdeen.—A performance of Handel's Alexander's Feast was given by the Tonic Sol-fa Institute on the 13th ult. The soloists were Miss Annie Francis, Mr. Parkinson, and Mr. Woollard. The choruses were well sung and much applauded. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Kirby was Organist, and Mr. Litster Conductor.

Belfast.—A most successful Concert was given by the Strandtown Choral Union, in St. Mark's School-house, on Tuesday evening, the 9th ult. The principal item in the programme was Gade's Cantata, Spring's Message, which was most creditably sung to the accompaniment of the pianoforte and harmonium. The other noticeable numbers were Hiller's three-part song, "Bells in May," remarkably well rendered by six ladies of the choir; "Robin Adair" and Sullivan's "My dearest heart," by a pupil of the Conductor; and the pianoforte and violin solos, respectively by Mrs. Kempton and Mr. Cohen. The chorus also sang very creditably several part-songs by Bennett, Pearson, Hatton, and Mendelssohn. Miss McGahey presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Cohen at the harmonium. Mr. W. J. Kempton conducted.

Birkenhead.—A Concert was given at the Music Hall on Thursday evening, the 18th ult., by the choral section of the 2nd Cheshire Rifle Volunteers, in aid of the Ladies' Charitable Institution, which has largely benefited from similar efforts in previous years. The same programme was repeated at New Brighton by the choral section of the "Second" on Friday evening, in aid of the Cottage Hospitals, Seacombe. An undoubtedly conspicuous feature of both Concerts was a glee for male voices, expressly composed for the occasions by Mr. E. Townshend Driffield, entitled "Queen Mab's Song," a charmingly-harmonised number, which was rendered with the finest effect by the vocalists.

Birmingham.—Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert was given in the Town Hall on Thursday evening, February 26. The programme was of more than usual interest, comprising Gade's First Symphony, (Op. 5 in C minor), the Overtures Der Freischütz (Weber), and Rienzi (Wagner): some minor pieces, including a Bourrée by Mr. Rowland M. Winn, and Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor. The vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, who gave a remarkably fine rendering of Weber's scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and Mr. Arnold Breeden, who made his first appearance and was well received. The orchestral pieces were well performed, and the concert one of the most successful of the kind given here. Mr. Stimpson played the organ concerto in his ablest manner; Messrs. Alban Stout and Winn accompanied the vocalists, and Mr. Stockley conducted.——The success of the Saturday Evening Popular Concerts continues. On the 7th ult. the Amateur Harmonic Association gave Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and Hear my Prayer, with a miscellaneous selection, under the direction of Mr. Stockley. On the 14th ult. the Festival Choral Society gave selections from Max Bruch's Cantata The Lay of the Bell, and Handel's Israel in Egypt, and miscellaneous pieces for Mr. Stimpson, organ; Mrs. Titterton, Messrs. Young and Horrex, vocalists. Mr. Winn accompanied and Mr. Stockley conducted. The programme for the 21st ult. included Gade's Erl King's Daughter and Haydn's Spring, by the chorus and full band of the Handsworth Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. C. J. Stevens.——The organ at the Masonic Hall has been used for Recitals by Mr. Rowland M. Winn, Mr. Arthur Trickett, Mr. F. Robinson, and Mr. W. Astley Langston, and the various performances have been fairly well attended.

Blairgowrie.—The members of the Rattray Choral Society gave a performance of Samson in the Town Hall on the 18th ult., assisted by the following artists: Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Whitehead, and Mr. Brandon. There was a small but efficient orchestra. The chorus numbered about sixty voices, fairly well balanced, and the work was rendered in a thoroughly artistic manner. Mr. Neale conducted with his usual ability. At the close an enthusiastic vote of thanks was passed to the performers, on the motion of Sir James Ramsay, Bart., of Banff.

Bradford.—The second of Mr. Midgley's fifth season of two Concerts of Chamber Music took place in the Church Institute, on Friday, February 27. Mr. Midgley was assisted by Herr Straus, Herr Daubert, and Dr. Wolff. The programme commenced with Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, and included a Trio by Dr. Wolff in D minor (Op. 17), performed for the first time and received with much favour. Dr. Wolff received a warm compliment at its close. No item on the programme excited more interest than Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Op. 78). Herr Straus chose two particularly interesting morceaux for his solo—a Romance by Joachim, and a Toccata by Hiller, both admirably played. Herr Daubert played Marcello's Sonata in F, a good specimen of the seventeenth century music. Mr. Midgley played as a solo a Serenade and Barcarole by Oliver King, a clever young English composer.——On Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., a Concert was given in the Church Institute by the Manningham Vocal Union, in aid of the Orphans' Home. The first part consisted of Sullivan's Oratorio The Prodigal Son, the second part of songs, part-songs, &c. The solos were excellently sung by Mrs. Frank McGowen, Mrs. Fer. Meer, Miss Misdale, Miss Richardson, Mr. R. Richardson, and Mr. S. Barker. In the second part Raff's Tarantella for four hands was finely played by Miss Kate Gurney and Mr. F. C. Atkinson. The Concert was a thorough success, and the singing of the choruses and part-songs reflected the greatest credit upon the Conductor of the society, Mr. F. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac. Mr. Arthur T. Akeroyd was the accompanist.——Mr. Edward Misdale, assisted by Signor Risegari (violin), and M. Vieuxtemps (violoncello), gave his annual Concert of Chamber Music on Thursday evening, the 18th ult., in the Mechanics' Institute, before a select and appreciative audience. The programme included three pieces which were new to Bradford concert-goers, i.e., Rubinstein's Trio in B flat (Op 52), a Trio (Op. 1) by Hermann Goetz, and a Sonata for piano and violoncello by Xaver Scharwenka. Beethoven's Sonata for piano and violin (in A minor, No. 4) was interpreted with great skill and judgment by Mr. Misdale and Signor Risegari. M. Vieuxtemps played a violoncello solo (from a Sonata in A, by Boccherini) in his usually fine style. Mr. Misdale deserves thanks for bringing before a Bradford audience such a high-class programme.

Bradford, U.S.—The first Concert of the fourth series, under the direction of Mr. S. M. Downs, was given at the Academy Hall, on Wednesday, February 18, by Messrs. W. H. Sherwood and Alfred Wilkie, before a large audience of the students and their friends. The programme, which was an excellent one, was splendidly rendered. Mr. Sherwood's playing created an enthusiasm seldom witnessed at a Recital of this kind. Mr. Wilkie sang magnificently Beethoven's "Adelaide," Mendelssohn's "The garland," Raff's "Immer bei der," receiving enthusiastic encores after each number.

Clifton.—On Monday, the 8th ult., a Concert was given at the Victoria Lecture Hall, in aid of the School Fund. The first part of the programme consisted of the first part of Spohr's Last Judgment. The solos were well rendered by Miss Kate Probert, Miss Annie Howell, Messrs. S. Pearce, and J. Kerry. Mr. F. H. Dyer accompanied the work with his accustomed ability. The Overture (played as a duet), by Mr. Dyer and Miss Kate Probert, received a very artistic rendering. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

Crewe.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their first performance of Elijah in the Town Hall, on the 9th ult., to a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr. G. H. Welch, and Mr. Thomas Brandon. The orchestra, which had been considerably strengthened for the occasion by contingents from the bands of Messrs. Charles Hallé and Edward de Jong, was under the leadership of Mr. Taylor, Manchester. Mr. F. James conducted, and Mr. George Young rendered good service at the harmonium. The work was very creditably performed, and great praise is due to Mr. James for the careful training of the choir.

Croydon.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Public Hall before a crowded audience on Monday, the 15th ult. The soloists were Misses Annie Marriott and A. Butterworth and Messrs. Shakespeare and W. H. Burgon, the latter of whom created a very marked impression in the airs, "Why do the nations" and "The trumpet shall sound," the trumpet obbligato to which was well played by Mr. McGrath. Mr. Shakespeare sang the Passion Music with much feeling, and declaimed the air, "Thou shalt break them," with great force and vigour. The choir consisted of about 120 members of the Croydon Vocal Union, and the whole of the choruses were given with excellent effect and precision. The band numbered thirty, principally selected from the Crystal Palace orchestra. Mr. Norman Carr presided at the organ. The performance was efficiently conducted by Mr. Eb. Carr.

Darlington.—On Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., a grand Concert was given in the Central Hall, under the management of Mr. W. J. Hoggett. The programme consisted of popular ballads, well rendered by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Signor Foli. Signor Mora accompanied, and contributed some solos which were warmly applauded.

Dover.—A grand Evening Concert was given to the Dover Catch Club on Thursday, February 26, by the Mayor (R. Dickeson, Esq.), when there was a very large attendance. The artists engaged were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Kate Baxter, Mr. W. Coates (of the Temple, London), and Mr. Prenton. An excellent programme was provided, and the Concert was most successful. The arrangements were under the direction of W. Gorton, Esq.

Dublin.—A Concert was given in the Exhibition Palace on Saturday, February 28, in aid of the Dublin Charities Fund, under the patronage of Her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough. The artists were Mdlle. Welmi (who was highly successful in her rendering of Haydn's "With verdure clad," and a Cavatina from Lucia), Miss Bessie Craig (whose songs were much applauded), Messrs. Jones, Allen, and M'Kiernan. The Concert terminated with the quartet from Verdi's Rigoletto, "Un di si ben," admirably sung by Mdlle. Welmi, Miss Bessie Craig, Mr. M'Kiernan, and Mr. Allen.

Edinburgh.—An Organ Recital was given by Sir Herbert Oakeley on the 11th ult., in the music class-room, to a crowded audience. The greater proportion of the numbers were selected from the programme of the annual University Concert, and the Recital might therefore be considered an appropriate introduction to that popular event. Handel's aria from Berenice was excellently sung by Mr. Arthur Makgill. The choral songs were encored, Sir Herbert's extemporisation on the well-known "Boat song" being especially noticeable. Mr. J. M. Smieton's Gavotte showed considerable musical genius, being quaintly expressed with well-marked rhythm.

Ely.—On Tuesday, February 24, the members of the Musical Society gave a very successful performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater and a selection from St. Paul, assisted by the Misses Dimmock and gentlemen of the Cathedral Choir. The choruses were particularly well sung throughout, as were also the solos; special mention may be made of the duet "Quis est homo," given with much effect by the Misses Dimmock, and "I will praise Thee" by Mr. Taylor, also excellently sung. Mr. George Minns's rendering of the aria "Be thou faithful," was very successful and deservedly encored. Dr. Chipp conducted, and very great praise is due to him for the manner in which the music was performed and for the present efficient state of the Society.

Folkestone.—The first Concert of the Amateur Orchestral Society, given on Monday, the 1st ult., in the Town Hall, proved most successful. The orchestra of thirty-six performers was composed with the strictest regard to the proper musical value of the various instruments. The programme commenced with the Overture "La Dame de Trèfle," in which the violin obbligato was beautifully played by Mr. J. R. C. Roberts, the leader of the orchestra, and son of the Conductor. A flute solo, "Nel cor più," by Mr. G. Nicholson, was highly appreciated. The vocalists were Miss Lena Law, Messrs. Baxter, Carter, and Lawler. Mozart's Symphony in G (No. 12) was performed throughout admirably. A full meed of praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. H. S. Roberts.

Gateshead.—A most successful Concert, organised by Chief Constable Elliott, of Gateshead, was held in the Town Hall, West Street, on the 19th ult. The programme contained the names of the following artists: Miss José Sherrington, Madame Poole, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Thurley Beale, vocalists; Mr. James Preston, accompanist; Mr. E. J. Rogers, solo flute; Mr. R. Smith, solo clarionet; and Mr. J. Richardson, solo harp. Mr. J. Amers was the musical director.

Glasgow.—A Concert of sacred music was given by the Musical Association of Anderston Church on Tuesday, February 24. The programme included selections from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, "The heavens are telling" (Haydn), "As pants the hart" (Spohr), "How lovely are the messengers" (Mendelssohn), and the "Hallelujah" Chorus (Handel), all of which were sung by the choir in a most creditable style. There were also several solos, duets, and quartets given in a manner which showed that the choir numbers amongst its members some highly accomplished vocalists. Mr. J. Ives ably conducted.——The North British Railway Glasgow Musical Association held their annual Concert in the City Hall on February 26, the proceeds of which (viz., the handsome sum of £133 13s.) were handed over to the Fund on behalf of the Sufferers by the Tay Bridge accident. The artists (whose services were given gratuitously) were Misses Struthers and Kean, Messrs. Murray, Riddell; Channon Cornwall, Organist; and the Musical Association. The programme, a miscellaneous one, was rendered in a manner which reflects great credit on the Conductor, Mr. Adam Thomson. The grand piano was lent for the occasion by the eminent firm of Messrs. Paterson, Sons and Co. The hall was crowded by an appreciative audience.—— The Glasgow Select Choir gave their Annual Humorous Concert on the 6th ult. in the St. Andrew's Hall. The programme consisted of some of Mr. Frederic Archer's happiest settings, including "Kate Dalrymple," "The Deil's awa'," "Old King Cole," "Tibbie Fowler," &c., all being rendered with that precision and vigour for which this choir is justly celebrated. Mr. James Allan (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Archer) conducted with great ability, and sang Sullivan's "From rock to rock," which was encored. —— A Vocal and Instrumental Concert was given by the Pupils of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind (London) in the St. Andrew's Hall on the 18th ult. They were assisted by H. H. Prince Alexander of Hesse and E. J. Hopkins, Esq., Organist of the Temple, London. The programme consisted of vocal solos, duets, trios, and choruses, and organ and piano solos, all of which were well rendered by the pupils. Prince Alexander of Hesse contributed a violin solo, accompanied by Mr. Hopkins on the organ. An interesting exhibition of the way in which the pupils are taught was given under the direction of Mr. Campbell, in lieu of one of the part-songs. There was a large audience.——The St. George's Choral Union held their third and last Concert of the season on the 20th ult. in the St. Andrew's Hall. Considerable interest was attached to it, it being complimentary to Mr. W. Moodie, on the occasion of his retiring from the conductorship of the Union. There was a large assembly of old friends, who received Mr. Moodie with hearty applause. The programme, a thoroughly Scotch one, did credit alike to Mr. Moodie and the committee, and was gone through on the whole with good effect. Several solos were sung, two being deserving of special mention, viz., "Tam Glen," in which Miss Craigie thoroughly caught the humour, and "Alton water" by Mr. Stewart, which was given with great expression. Messrs. Stewart, Bird, and Carter, who impersonated Burns' "Three jolly boys" in "Willie brew'd a peck o' maut," were highly appreciated. Mr. Moodie's part-song, "The auld man," was received with great favour.

Greenock.—An amateur service of sacred music was given on the 2nd ult. in the Mid Parish Church by the choir (numbering about thirty), the money proceeds to be devoted to the Sabbath School Library Fund. The church was well filled, though the collection was not so handsome as might have been expected. The organ solos were performed in an artistic style by Mr. D. Middleton, Organist of the Church, and the anthems generally were rendered in a manner which reflected much credit upon the members and the Conductor. The opening quartet in the anthem "In the beginning" was sung by Miss Montgomery, Miss Inglis, Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Brown, and the solo which follows, "Thou art fairer," was sung in excellent style by Miss M. B. Tierny. The quartet, "His Name shall endure," which occurs in the anthem "Give the king Thy judgments," was rendered by Miss Tierny, Miss Rugen, Mr. Black, and Mr. J. Muir, each part being well sustained, and the bass solo recitative, "Blessed be the Lord God," immediately following, was sung with spirit, precision, and good taste by Mr. Muir. The tenor solo in "I will sing of Thy power" was well executed by Mr. John Tait, as was also the tenor solo in "Come and let us return." There were several miscellaneous vocal solos, which were well rendered and warmly received. A word of praise is due to the Conductor, Mr. D. Middleton, and also to Mr. Montague Smith, of Glasgow, who presided at the organ.

Hackney.—On Monday, the 15th ult., Mr. Howard Leask gave a Ballad Concert at the Manor Rooms before a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Albert James. Miss Davies's selection was extremely happy; "O that we two were maying" (Gounod) was given with great feeling, and produced pro longed applause. Miss Larkcom contributed Balfe's "I have been with the rose," with Sir J. Benedict's variations. Miss Turner's rich contralto voice was heard to perfection in "The lady of the Lea." Mr. Rigby, Mr. James, and Mr. Maybrick were also highly successful. Mr. Leask contributed three pianoforte solos, and assisted Mr. John Jeffereys, organist of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in the duties of accompanist.

Halifax.—An Organ Recital was given on February 26 in the Parish Church by the Organist, Dr. Roberts. Amongst other pieces, the programme included Haydn's "Kyrie" (Second Mass), Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata in B flat (No. 4), Rossini's "Quis est homo" (Stabat Mater), Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C major, and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March." There was a large and appreciative audience, and the sum of £12 12s. was handed over towards the churchwardens' expenses.

Hamilton, Canada.—The fourth Concert given by Mrs. Adamson and Mr. Aldous took place on February 10. The programme included the Allegro moderato from Haydn's Quartet (Op. 64); Adagio and Allegro agitato from Mendelssohn's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 4); a Romance for Violin and Pianoforte, by Mr. Aldous; Liszt's arrangement of the Tannhäuser March, exceedingly well played by Miss Alice Cummings; and a Melody in F and Valse Caprice by Rubinstein, played by Mr. Aldous. Two songs and two recitations were contributed by Miss Davis, from Boston, who gave evidence of great talent.

Harrogate.—A very successful Concert was given in the Albert Hall on Tuesday, the 16th ult. The first part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of glees, songs, &c., and a violin solo, which was contributed by Mr. Otto Bernhardt. The vocal soloists were the Misses Fannie Sellars, Stephenson, Thompson, and Potterton, and Messrs. Sewell, Parker, Adams, Grimshaw, and Speight. The second part was devoted to Mr. J. Allanson Benson's Cantata Bottreaux Bells, the orchestral accompaniments being arranged for piano and harmonium. The solo parts were taken by Mrs. J. A. Benson (Clare), Mr. Sewell (Penrose), and Mr. Parvin (Ralph). Mr. W. Booth and Mr. A. Gilling were most efficient accompanists.

Leamington.—Mr. Frank Spinney, the Conductor of the recent successful Messiah Festival, held in the Parish Church, has just been presented with a testimonial, in the form of a handsome escritoire, having on it a plate with this inscription: "Presented to Frank Spinney by members of the chorus in the Messiah Festival held in All Saints' Parish Church, Leamington, November, 1879, in appreciation of the successful manner he carried out the duties as Conductor."

Liverpool.—A fine performance of Samson was given on the 16th ult., the occasion being the final Concert of the forty-first season of the Philharmonic Society of Liverpool. The principal vocalists were Miss Georgina Burns, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Santley. Signor Randegger conducted. Of the series of Concerts that has just concluded, Sir Julius Benedict conducted seven, Mr. W. G. Cusins one, Herr Max Bruch one, and Signor Randegger three. Throughout the season the band and chorus were in excellent order, and bore their share of the work in a manner in keeping with the importance of the organisation to which they belong. Mr. W. T. Best was frequently at the organ during the series, and nothing more than this need be said of his fulfilment of his duties. Apart from other considerations connected with the forty-first season, it will always be notable as that during which Sir Julius Benedict retired from the conductorship of the Society, amid the most profound expressions of regret.

Longton.—By the kind permission of the Vicar, the Choral Society gave a very successful performance of the Messiah in St. John's Church on Thursday evening, the 18th ult., the principals being Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Helen d'Alton, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, and Mr. H. Rickard. The orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. H. Nuttall (of Mr. Charles Hallé's band) played well, and the organ, at which Mr. Bedsmore, of Lichfield Cathedral, presided, rendered efficient service in the unaccompanied recitatives. The choruses were admirably sung by the members of the Society, strengthened by help kindly rendered by the Hanley and Shelton Philharmonic Society. Mr. Robinson was solo trumpet, and Mr. E. H. Bloor conducted.

Lytham.—On Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., Mr. Thos. Armstrong, the recently appointed organist of St. John's Church, gave a Pianoforte Recital of classical music in the Bath Assembly Rooms, before a large audience. The programme included a selection of pianoforte solos from the works of Handel, Beethoven, Hummel, and Mendelssohn, and an Allegro moderato alla marcia, the composition of Mr. Armstrong. The vocalists were Miss E. Wade, Miss Fannie Lymn, and Mr. Fred. Walmisley, all of whom were very much applauded. The choir of St. John's Church contributed concerted music with good effect. The Recital was very successful.

Manchester.—The nineteenth Concert of the season of Mr. Hallé's Orchestral Concerts was given on the 4th ult. Miss Georgina Burns and Mr. Ludwig made their first appearance at these Concerts. Mr. Ludwig's fine voice told well in the songs allotted to him, and Miss Burns sang the "Polonaise" from Mignon with great care. The band played Brahms's Symphony with exquisite finish and precision.——The members of the Vocal Society gave their sixth and last Concert of the season on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of a very choice selection of glees and part-songs, excellently sung, several of which were redemanded, especially so the old quaint "Sally in our alley," which was capitally sung by Miss Standen, Miss Tervin, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Gordon. The other numbers which demand special attention were the fine old glees, "Blow, blow, thou winter wind" (Stevens), "O snatch me swift" (Callcott), "Come, see what pleasures" (James Elliott), and "Sir Patrick Spens" (Pearsall). Mr. Henry Guy made his only appearance this season. His singing of "Dormi puré," Serenade, by Scuderi, was marked by his accustomed delicately finished style, and elicited great applause. He also sang the "Hidden casket" (Watson), and a serenade, "Good-night, fair maid," by Stark. This latter was encored. Thirteen seasons have now passed away since these Concerts were first established under the able direction of Mr. Henry Wilson, who has done good work in bringing forward a number of old glees and part-songs scarcely known to this generation, as well as all the best modern ones. ——At the twentieth and last Concert of the twenty-second season of Mr. Hallé's Concerts, on the 11th ult., the performance consisted of Faust, a dramatic legend in four parts, by Berlioz (in English), the band and chorus consisting of 350 performers. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Herr Henschel. As a whole the performance was a grand one, the principals, band and chorus, doing their utmost. The house was crammed to its utmost capacity, hundreds being unable to gain admission. The Concerts will be resumed on the last Thursday in October.

Netherton.—A new Organ, by Messrs. James Conacher and Sons, of Huddersfield, recently erected in the Wesleyan Chapel, was used for the first time on Monday, the 8th ult., when two services were held, and, after the evening service, an Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. H. Pearson, of Brighouse, who presided at the services. Selections from two of Handel's oratorios were well rendered by an admirable choir, composed of members of the Huddersfield Choral Society, and Miss Ramsden, of Brighouse.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The members of Mr. Rea's Choir gave a very successful Concert in the Town Hall on the 15th ult., when Henry Smart's Cantata the Bride of Dunkerron was performed. The choral singing was in every respect highly satisfactory. The leads of every part were taken with precision, and the exquisite light and shade gave proof of the great care the Conductor must have taken in rehearsing the work. The solo parts were well sustained by Miss Ellen Lamb, Messrs. Frank Boyle and Bridson. The second part of the Concert consisted of the Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor, Entr'acte from Rosamunde, songs by each of the soloists, a harp solo by Mr. Blamphin, two effective unaccompanied part-songs, "Parted," and "The brook," by the Conductor, and the Prayer from Mosè in Egitto. The hall was filled, and repeated bursts of applause showed that Mr. Rea had an appreciative audience.

Nottingham.—On the 2nd ult. a highly successful Concert was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society. Owing to this being the last of the series announced for the season, and the work chosen being Mendelssohn's Elijah, an overflowing audience assembled. The soprano music was sung by Miss Annie Marriott. The contralto was Miss Cravino, the tenor, Mr. F. Boyle, and Mr. Ludwig sustained the part of the Prophet. Mr. Ludwig had not been known to sing in Oratorio before, but the result proved highly satisfactory. His voice seemed admirably adapted to the music, and his efforts elicited great applause. Miss Marriott sang the part of the Widow with much feeling, and also the solos "Hear ye, Israel," and "I am he that comforteth;" Miss Cravino made a favourable impression in most of the contralto music, and Mr. F. Boyle gave the airs "If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous," with good effect. In the trio of angels, "Lift thine eyes," the second soprano was taken by Miss Honeybone, a clever amateur belonging to the Society. The choruses were well rendered, especially "Thanks be to God," and "Behold God the Lord passed by," reflecting much credit upon the training of the Conductor, Mr. Henry Farmer, who had been ably assisted by Mr. John Adcock during the rehearsals. The organ was most effectively taken by Mr. Irons, who skilfully supplied the deficiency in the reeds of the band. The Concert was financially and musically a great success.——On the 10th ult. Mr. Pyatt's annual popular Concert was given at the Albert Hall. The performers were Herr Joachim, Herr L. Ries, Mr. Zerbini, Signor Piatti, Mr. Charles Hallé, and Madame Patey. Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 74, was well performed. Mr. Charles Hallé played Chopin's Nocturne in D flat, and Barcarole in F sharp, with his usual finish, and in Haydn's Trio in C major, No. 14, with Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti. Herr Joachim played Handel's Sonata in A major, and was loudly applauded. Madame Patey's songs were Beethoven's "Creation's hymn," "The old harpsichord" by Roeckel, and Blumenthal's "Old, old story," the latter being encored. Mr. Zerbini conducted.

Outlane.—On Saturday, the 13th ult., Haydn's Oratorio, The Creation, was performed in the Wesleyan Chapel, by a chorus consisting of about a hundred vocalists of the district and surrounding places, comprising many old members of the Huddersfield Choral Society, and a band of about twenty performers, the principal instrumentalists of which are also members of that Society, and the following vocal soloists: Miss Tomlinson, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Rickard. The choruses were remarkably well sung, particularly "Achieved is the glorious work," and the whole performance was most praiseworthy, much of its success being due to the conducting of Mr. Henry Pearson, of Golcar.

Oxford.—The Messiah was performed by the members of the Chora, Society on Tuesday evening, the 2nd ult., to a very large and appreciative audience, the principals being Miss Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The choruses best performed were "And the glory," "Glory to God," and "Behold the Lamb of God." The whole performance was one reflecting the greatest credit on Mr. Allchin, the Conductor.

St. Helens, Lancashire.—A Concert was given on the 8th ult in the Brook Street Congregational School-room, in connection with the Sunday School Union. The principal items in the programme were "Comfort ye" and "Every valley" (from the Messiah), sung by Mr. J. T. Elliott; Topliff's "Consider the lilies," sung by Miss Sharples; Gounod's "Nazareth," Handel's "Arm, arm, ye brave," sung by Mr. Henry Parr; and Bennett's unaccompanied quartet, "God is a Spirit." Stainer's anthem, "O Zion that bringest good tidings," Handel's "And the glory of the Lord" and "Hallelujah," were sung by a select choir of about sixty voices. Miss A. L. Sharples played the pianoforte accompaniments tastefully, Mr. John Hayes presided at the American organ, and Mr. J. T. Elliott conducted. The whole of the pieces were evidently appreciated by a large and intelligent audience.

Sheffield.—A party of vocalists, consisting of Miss Anna Williams, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Signor Foli, with Signor Antonio Mora as solo pianist, gave a Concert, under the management of Mr. Charles Harvey, at the Albert Hall on the 12th ult. Miss Anna Williams sang with much effect "Tell me, my heart," "She wore a wreath of roses," and "Twickenham Ferry." Miss D'Alton rendered Cowen's "Better land" with feeling and taste, and Mr. Harper Kearton (who made his first appearance in Sheffield) gave an air from Flotow's Martha and "The Bay of Biscay" with much success. Signor Foli had a brilliant reception, and each of his songs evoked great applause. After singing "Hybrias the Cretan" he was thrice recalled, and his rendering of "The diver" produced an irresistible encore, to which he responded by singing "I fear no foe." Signor Mora contributed a couple of pianoforte solos, which he executed in a masterly manner. He also occupied the post of accompanist.

Sherborne.—The Sherborne School Musical Society gave its 53rd Concert on the 4th ult. in the new School-room. The programme was short, but exceedingly well selected. Haydn's Symphony, "The Clock" was given with great spirit and brightness, and evoked more applause than is usually accorded to instrumental music. The chief vocal item of the evening was Mendelssohn's Motett, Hear my Prayer. The solo was sung by Gibbs, whose pure treble voice and clear enunciation have never been heard to greater advantage. The choir also performed its part with a precision which promises well for the Society's future. Almost all the short numbers of the programme received encores, but the favourites were the vocal quartets, and Ainslie's song, "The Stirrup Cup," all of which were excellently rendered. Lough was an efficient and discreet accompanist, and also played Bennett's Barcarole with great taste and execution. The room was filled with an enthusiastic audience. Mr. Louis N. Parker, as usual, conducted.

Southport.—Mr. J. S. Watson's series of Subscription Concerts for the present season were brought to a close on the 6th ult., with a most successful Concert in the Cambridge Hall. Mr. Charles Hallé's band played with a precision of attack, a light and shade, and a delicacy of expression, that rank it amongst the very best orchestras in existence. The programme included Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, which was magnificently rendered. The pianoforte solos consisted of Schumann's Novelette and a Fantasie impromptu by Chopin. Both were played by Mr. Hallé with his irreproachable powers of execution, and with a warmth and verve that were simply delightful. The vocalists were Madame Edith Wynne and Mr. C. Leumaine. Mr. John Hodgson was the accompanist.

Sunderland.—On Friday, February 27, Mr. George F. Vincent gave a Pianoforte Recital, which was highly successful. The programme contained compositions by Gade, Bach, Paradies, Brahms, Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Dupont, and Hummel. Mr. Vincent's pianoforte playing was extremely artistic, his execution of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, Chopin's Nocturne (Op. 32, No. 1), and the Grand March from Wagner's Tannhäuser, showing that he is at home in all styles. Mr. Vincent was assisted by Madame Whatford (vocalist), Mr. Henry Nuttall (violin), and Mr. A. Avison (violoncello). Mr. William Wilson acted as accompanist.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. George F. Smith, Jun., Sub-Professor R.A.M., to St. Magnus, London Bridge.—Mr. Charlton T. Speer, R.A.M., A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's, Bow Common.—Mr. Edmund W. Wheeler, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's, Notting Hill, W.—Mr. W. S. Woods, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Holywell, N.W.—Mr. Alfred H. Sugden, Assistant-Organist and Choirmaster to St. Agatha's, Finsbury.—Mr. W. Charles Hetreed, to Killarney Cathedral.—Mr. Charles F. Pascoe, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of the Annunciation, Chislehurst.—Mr. W. E. Bartlett, to the Parish Church, Redhill.—Mr. Philip Millner, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. T. Loder Childerstone, to St. John Baptist, Holland Road, Kensington.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. B. C. Kendle (Tenor) to St. Paul's Church, Balls Pond Road, Canonbury, N.

PROPOSED NEW ORGAN FOR
St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich.

ALL those interested in MUSIC and in the advancement of MUSICAL CULTURE are invited to assist the movement now on foot for placing in ST. ANDREW'S HALL, where the NORFOLK and NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVALS have been held triennially since 1824, an ORGAN which shall be a credit and an ornament to the noble old building in which it will be placed. It has been thought that inasmuch as the Norwich Festivals have a more than local interest, many from a distance may be pleased to share in the subscription-list, which now reaches £900, including liberal donations from the Mayor and Sheriff of Norwich, the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Kimberley, Lord Suffield, K.C.B., Lord Stafford, Sir R. J. Buxton, Bart., M.P., J. J. Colman, Esq., M.P., C. S. Read, Esq., M.P., Messrs. Gurneys and Co., &c. The Committee appointed for carrying out the project includes the names of Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Organist of Norwich Cathedral, Dr. Bunnett, Organist to the Norwich Festivals, Dr. Horace Hill, and other well-known local musicians, so that all subscribers may rest assured that their money will be worthily employed.

Dr. Bunnett's Report on the present Organ in St. Andrew's Hall states: "The present state of the Organ is most unsatisfactory, both in size and quality. Without going into all the defects, I may mention the following facts, which will speak for themselves: Not a single legitimate organ composition can be played upon the present instrument. The Organ is used for festivals and concerts, but in every instance the music has to be altered to suit the organ. During the last few years several works of importance have been performed at our festivals and concerts, where a special organ part has been composed, and not one of them could be played as the composer intended; when I mention such works as 'Elijah,' 'St. Cecilia,' 'Joseph,' Sullivan's 'Festival Te Deum,' 'Fridolin,' and many others, it will be quite sufficient. At the last Festival Choral Concert in December, when Haydn's 'Creation' was performed, I was requested to fill in some of the orchestral parts. I had not a stop in the organ suitable. The question will be asked by some, Why not add to the present organ? The requirements of the present age are so far different from what they were fifty years back, that it would be perfectly useless to spend any money about the present instrument in its worn-out state. It would be far cheaper and more lasting, and would meet the wants of the present generation, to have an entirely new instrument with all the modern improvements."

Subscriptions may be sent to the Mayor of Norwich, or to Messrs. W. E. Hansell, Wm. Heaver, and Chas. E. Noverre, Honorary Secretaries to the Fund, Norwich.

MR. FAULKNER LEIGH will give his SECOND CONCERT at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, April 14, at Eight o'clock. The programme will include Madame Sainton-Dolby's Cantata, "The Story of the Faithful Soul" (first time of performance), and a New Cantata (Seria Buffa) by George Fox, "Imogene" (also first time of performance), with full Orchestra and Chorus and a Miscellaneous Selection; Second Suite for Orchestra, "L'Arlésienne," by Bizet (first time of performance in England). Mr. Weist Hill's Orchestra is engaged for this occasion. Conductors: Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. Sidney Naylor, and M. Sainton. Artists: Miss José Sherrington and Mdlle. Bauermeister, Madame Antoinette Sterling and Miss Lloyd, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Signor Foli, and Mr. George Fox. Grand organ, Mr. James M. Coward. Tickets: 7s., 5s., 3s., 2s., and 1s., at Austin's Office; Chappell's, 50, New Bond Street; and of Mr. Leigh, 6, Montagu Place, Montagu Square, W.

PARISH CHURCH, Greenwich.—TENOR and BASS REQUIRED immediately, in Choir. £10. Apply for particulars to Mr. H. Killick Morley, 71, South Street, Greenwich, S.E.

WANTED, TENOR and BASS, for a Church near High Holborn. Must be good readers and able to take solo parts. Stipend, £10 a year each. Apply, by letter, A. Z., 13, Egbert Street, St. George's Road, N.W.

DERRY CATHEDRAL.—WANTED, BASS. £20. Duties would not interfere with the ordinary occupations of a person holding a situation in the city. Apply to Rev. C. Boyton, Londonderry.

AN ORGANIST of considerable experience desires an ENGAGEMENT at a Chapel, in or near London, at once. Organist, 70, Packington Street, N.

THE REV. A. C. BISHOP, Bramdean House, Alresford, Hants, strongly recommends a Young Person for Church Music and to Train a Choir. He will be answerable for her character and musical qualifications. Left her situation through death of the Incumbent.

WANTED, by a Lady, RE-ENGAGEMENT in a Music Warehouse. Experienced and good pianist. Excellent references. Address, stating terms, D. E., Browning's Music Warehouse, Exeter.

ORGAN PRACTICE.—Fine New Instrument. 3 manuals, separate pedal organ. Terms, strictly inclusive, one shilling per hour. Entwisle's Camberwell Studio, 1, Charles Street, Camberwell New Road.

SYDNEY SMITH'S

Pianoforte Method.

This unrivalled work is now firmly established as the Pianoforte Instruction-Book in nearly all the principal educational establishments in Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, the United States of America, India, Australia, New Zealand, &c. It is supplied direct by the Publishers, or may be had of any Musicseller in the world,

64 Pages, Full Music Size. Price Five Shillings.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction, well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"Mr. Sydney Smith's Method is new, not alone in name, but in fact, and the research, care, and time bestowed upon it have resulted in the production of the best, because simplest and clearest, Instruction-Book for the Piano. While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to insure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"Care is taken to interest the learner from the outset, and for this reason, as well as others, the 'Method' is eminently valuable."—Daily Telegraph.

TECHNICAL GUIDE

TO

TOUCH, FINGERING, AND EXECUTION

ON THE PIANOFORTE.

Price Three Shillings.

"We quite agree with the author of this book that a very decided line should be drawn between pianoforte 'studies' and pianoforte 'exercises;' for it is only by a vigorous practice of mere finger-work that true mechanism can be obtained; and to hope to play any of the studies of the great masters, therefore, before the hand has been properly trained by 'exercise,' is manifestly absurd, for it is beginning at the wrong end. Mr. Sloper truly observes, 'No one should attempt Moscheles's Chromatic Study (No. 3 of Book I.) who has not thoroughly mastered the simple chromatic scale, nor, to take an easier instance, hope, by practising Heller's First Study, Op. 46, to obtain the evenness of touch and clearness of articulation which only a steadfast adherence to five-finger exercises can give.' To those who believe in the truth of these remarks the book before us will prove of the utmost value. The author modestly says, 'I shall be glad and flattered if it meets with the approbation of my professional brethren,' and we can scarcely doubt that his hope will be realised; for although pianists do not always agree as to the method of fingering certain passages, the broad principles are sufficiently recognised, and it is good that pupils, in the absence of the master, should have so systematic a work to refer to. We are glad to find that Mr. Sloper recommends the practice of what may be termed the 'harmonic' as well as the 'melodic' minor scale."—Musical Times.

The Editor.

"Dr. Grove's Dictionary will be a boon to every intelligent lover of music."—Saturday Review.

"What is modestly called a 'Dictionary' might have fairly been entitled an 'Encyclopædia,' for the editor has included in his scheme everything that belongs to music, or is allied, or is even distantly related to it. It would be a great mistake to regard this work as useful only for the purposes of reference. It is a collection of interesting and valuable articles on all kinds of musical subjects, which amateurs, who take a genuine interest in the art they profess to love, will read from beginning to end."—Daily News.

"We now take leave of this 'Dictionary,' recommending it heartily to our readers as full of instruction and amusement."—Times.

"What will strike the reader first of all, perhaps, is the fulness and completeness of the information here collected."—Examiner.

PHYSIOLOGY AND HYGIENE OF THE VOICE,

With especial reference to its Cultivation and Preservation. For the Use of Speakers and Singers. By Gordon Holmes, Physician to the Municipal Throat and Ear Infirmary. Crown 8vo, illustrated, 6s. 6d.

The chief aim of this treatise is to furnish persons who make an artistic or professional use of the vocal organs, with a concise but complete account of those scientific relations of the voice, physical and medical, which are generally only alluded to cursorily, or passed over altogether, in works on elocution and singing.

"The work is in every sense a creditable one, both to the publishers and the author."—Lancet.

J. Curwen & Sons' New Publications

THE EARTH IS THE LORD'S. Sacred Chorus with independent organ part. Composed by G. B. Allen, Mus. B. This new composition, published this day, can be used as a Festival Anthem, or by Choral Societies at Concerts. It is full of life and power. Staff Notation, with organ part, 3d.; Tonic Sol-fa vocal score, 1d.

THE HARMONY PLAYER for the HARMONIUM, Staff Notation, by John Curwen, assisted by H. Fisher, Mus. D., and George Oakey, Mus. B. Mr. Henry F. Frost writes in the Music Trade Review: "This is really a tutor for the harmonium, but contains features distinct from those to be found in ordinary instruction books. It is intended specially for students who have first mastered the Tonic Sol-fa Notation. A considerable amount of space is devoted to the question of finger training. The harmonic structure of each exercise is carefully explained, and thus the pupil is advanced simultaneously in two branches of musical art. We have seldom met with so much valuable material comprised within forty-four pages of print." Price 1s. 6d.

SHORT ANTHEMS for CHOIRS and CONGREGATIONS. Edited by J. Spencer Curwen, A.R.A.M. The Musical Standard says: "We have here twenty-five specimens of pieces, all of which are within reach of the average church choir; and that the names of Macfarren, Goss, Elvey, Hopkins, and Hatton are among the list of contributors, will attest the quality of the music here presented. Many of the anthems have been written specially for the work. We strongly recommend choirmasters to look at the work. Price 1s., either notation.

THE HARMONIUM ALBUM, Staff Notation. Edited by J. Spencer Curwen. The Christian World says: "This album may perhaps be considered the best work of its kind that has appeared." Over 100 movements adapted to the character and capacity of the harmonium. Complete in cloth, 5s., or in two vols. paper cover, 2s. each. Specimen page gratis.

THE CHORAL HAND-BOOK, containing Sacred and Secular Choruses, Quartets, Glees, and Part-songs, all of popular sort. Thirty-six numbers now ready, price 1½d. or 3d. each. Contents gratis. Staff Notation.

CHORAL LEAFLETS, 1d. each, containing short pieces, Staff Notation. Twelve numbers now ready. Contents gratis.

STAFF NOTATION LIST, gratis and post-free to any part of the world, gives particulars of popular Cantatas, Congregational Anthems, Theoretical Works, &c.

NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION

OF THE

OF

ROBERT SCHUMANN

CLARA SCHUMANN.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have much pleasure in calling attention to the new and complete edition of Schumann's Works, edited by Madame Schumann, and about to be published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. This is of course the first time it has been possible to obtain a complete edition of Schumann's Works, and it is perhaps unnecessary to point out the great advantage the edition will receive from being edited by Madame Schumann.

The first issue of the publication, containing—
Op. 9. Carnival
Op. 10. Phantasiestücke
Op. 17. Phantasie
Op. 21. Novelletten
} In One Volume, 10s. 6d. net,

now ready, and may be had on application.

THE ONLY COMPLETE EDITION
CONTAINING BOOKS 7 and 8.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO WELL. By One who has taught himself. 1s.
"To both moderate and indifferent players this little manual is worth its weight in gold."
"We commend this little book to those who wish to play well."
"Here, in the compass of fourteen pages, is matter calculated to produce better results than half-a-dozen years' teaching."
"Our author says 'method' is everything in practising; we cordially recommend his method to those who wish to know the secret of playing well."
"Shows clearly the way to success in pianoforte playing."
"From henceforth there ought to be no excuse for the 'sloppy' kind of playing to which we are too much accustomed."

THE STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

Carefully compiled from the best and most authentic Sources,

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

Price One Shilling.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' PIANOS

Extracts from Opinions of the Musical Profession and London Press:—

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Wigmore Street, London, for superiority of Pianos exhibited at the Paris Exhibition, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, this distinction being conferred on no other British Pianoforte Manufacturer."—Morning Post.

"There is but one class of Gold Medals for the Exhibition, and the Decoration of the Cross of the Legion of Honour constitutes a SUPERIOR RECOMPENSE."

"A. FETIS,
"Reporter of the Musical Jury, Paris International Exhibition of 1867."

"PARIS, November 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the ease with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent Pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to every requirement of the pianist. CH. GOUNOD."

"PARIS, September 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, find that the palm belongs to the Grand Pianos of the House of BRINSMEAD.

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN.
"D. MAGNUS."

"PARIS.

"I have played several times at the Paris Exhibition on the Grand Pianos of Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, and I have found them most beautiful. The sound is full, melodious, and of extraordinary power, the touch is extremely elastic, and the repetition is excellent. A peculiarity of these Pianos consists in the prolongations of the sounds, which enable the player to produce great harmonic effects, and which exist in no other instruments. This I have demonstrated to the Jurors of the Exhibition, who came to hear and examine these Pianos. As soon as they had heard these instruments they unanimously concurred in my opinion. "CHEVALIER DE KONTSKI.
"(Commandeur et Officier de plusieurs Ordres, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany)."

"The highest praise is certainly due to Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS for the complete success which has crowned their efforts to produce, on the most simple principles, a perfectly even, smooth and sensitive repetition touch. The purity of the tone and the excellent mechanism of the Pianos exhibited by them in the Paris Exhibition called forth warm eulogies from all competent critics.
"JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.
"(Member of the International Jury of the Paris Exhibition, 1878.)"

"Messrs. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, the eminent Pianoforte-makers, of Wigmore Street, have manufactured a magnificent Grand Pianoforte. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but, nevertheless, realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all the degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a speciality in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture."—Illustrated London News.

"The new Pianoforte claims notice not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties."—Daily News.

"These Pianos have received the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

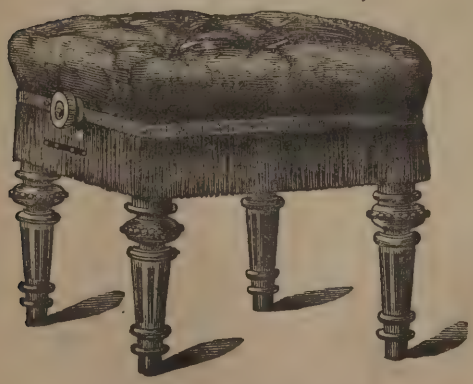
PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")



THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

Price Lists and Illustrations free on application to us or to any Musicseller, through whom these Stools and other articles of Music Furniture can be obtained.

WAGNER ON "BEETHOVEN."*

IT is scarcely creditable to the English people that Wagner's treatise on Beethoven's music existed in German ten years before appearing as a translation into our insular tongue. However much we may differ from the composer of the "Nibelungen Ring," and hold that he and Beethoven have nothing in common, it is a plain duty to be familiar, and even intimate, with the opinions of one famous man about another. Gladly, therefore, we welcome Mr. Dannreuther's translation of the work before us, doing so with the more warmth because the German of Wagner—in its way as Wagneresque as the English of Carlyle is Carlylesque—is difficult reading even to those most familiar with the ordinary language of our Teutonic kin. Mr. Dannreuther has achieved his task with the conscientiousness of his nature, and with a success due to much tact and patience. Thanks to these qualities, the deliberate judgment of the Bayreuth Master upon him of Bonn remains no longer a sealed book for English readers, and an interesting contribution to the literature of our art has had the scope of its influence enlarged.

Wagner tells us in his preface that he was provoked to write upon Beethoven by the centenary of the master's birth. He had, it appears, looked forward to the chance of delivering an oration at some commemorative fête; but as, in 1870, German thought and feeling were concentrated upon the war with France, the desired opportunity did not present itself. Under these circumstances Wagner committed to paper the thoughts he intended to speak, doing so at greater length than would otherwise have been possible. To this we owe a dissertation on the philosophy of music in general, and some enlarged and elaborate ideas about Beethoven's music in particular—results not the least interesting among those which have sprung indirectly from the great conflict waged ten years ago.

Wagner proposes, at the outset, to search for "the peculiar trait by which a musician is known as belonging to a particular nation," doing so with special reference to Beethoven as to a typical case. We are told, to begin with, that the circumstances of the master's life have no obvious connection with, or relation to, his artistic works. "Supposing we had all possible information about special facts before us, microscopically distinct, even then we should see nothing beyond what is contained in the account, for instance, that the master had at first designed the 'Sinfonia Eroica' as an act of homage to young General Bonaparte, and inscribed his name upon the title-page, and that he had subsequently struck out the name when he heard that Bonaparte had made himself Emperor. None of our poets has ever designated the tendency connected with one of his principal works in so marked a manner; yet what aid can such a plain indication give us in judging one of the most wonderful of musical creations? Can it explain a single bar of the score? Is it not sheer folly to think seriously of making such an attempt? I believe the most positive information we may get about the man Beethoven will, at best, stand in the same relation to the musician Beethoven as General Bonaparte stands to the 'Sinfonia Eroica.' From this point of view the great musician must ever remain a perfect mystery." Wagner contends that here the musician differs from the poet. In the case of Goethe and Schiller a certain connection between their life and time and their works can be traced, and our author, after asserting as much, goes on to investigate the reasons why it is not so with their illustrious musical compatriot. Here he plunges far down into the depths of the philosophy of his art, propounding a thesis as thus: "Exactly on the manner of the intuition of the Idea is based the entire difference between the poet and musician." The proposition is intelligible enough as such, and we are curious to know how it will be worked out. To this end Wagner draws upon Schopenhauer for what he calls a "hypothetical elucidation," and also a "profound paradox." The philosopher contended that whereas the fine arts in general concern themselves with the Ideas of the world and their essential phenomena; and whereas the poet conveys those ideas to us by means of rational concepts, music is itself "an Idea of the world, since whoever could completely elucidate music, or, rather, translate it into rational concepts, would at the same time have produced a philosophy explaining the world." The paradox is, of course, discovered in the fact that music cannot, properly speaking, be explained by concepts at all, and this paradox, says Wagner, must be solved before Beethoven can be exhaustively estimated.

It is by no means easy to condense the argument by which Wagner, after Schopenhauer, tries to reach the solution desired. We may say, however, that a distinction is drawn between the idea which follows from the cognition of relations and the essential nature of "the thing per se," the former being phenomena only. It is impossible to reason from these phenomena to the essential thing, and our access to the latter is made from a different side. Consciousness, argues Schopenhauer, has two sides, e.g., "partly consciousness of one's own self, which is the Will; partly a consciousness of other things, and in the latter case primarily perceptive cognition of the outer world—apprehension of objects." Musical conception springs from the first of these two—the introverted side of consciousness—since it can have nothing in common with the apprehension of Ideas belonging to the perceptive cognition of the world. It follows that the musician must turn his eyes inwards rather than outwards; looking not to the phenomena of things, of which his art in its conceptiveness is independent, but to their essential nature. With the introverted side of our consciousness—that which is turned inwards and away from exterior phenomena—we apprehend the true character of things; but we do this only, reasons our philosopher, when we are capable of looking inwards with the same clearness as we look outwards in grasping Ideas. Schopenhauer, as quoted by Wagner, proceeds to illustrate this by reference to the fact that in dreams we are conscious of a second world not less distinct than that we recognise when awake, but which is a world within us, perceived by an introverted function of the brain. Analogously, it is argued, a world of sound exists along with a world of light, the first bearing the same relation to the second as the dream-world to that of waking hours. Through this world of sounds the inner consciousness turns outwards, and expresses itself in the quickest and surest way. Thus we awake from a troubled dream—an excitation of the inner life—with a cry; but, says Wagner, "we have less occasion to wonder at the cries being at once intelligible, than at the fact that an Art should have arisen from such an element; it being evident on the other hand that artistic production, as well as artistic perception, can only proceed from an alienation of consciousness from the excitations of the Will."

Here, then, we have arrived at the philosophical origin of music—the inner consciousness profoundly moved expresses itself in sound, and upon this instinctive utterance an art has been based. We are next invited to consider in what manner the art has arisen. It sprang naturally from a consciousness of the identity of our inner being with that of the outer world. That world as visible to the eye seems entirely different from us, and we look upon it unmoved until its relation to ourselves becomes obvious. Hence the plastic arts, in giving a mere semblance of things, leave the mind unexcited, in "that state of repose by which alone the pure perception of the object, conformable to its proper character, becomes possible." And this calming influence, says Wagner, has been transferred from the plastic arts to all arts; regarded as indispensable to æsthetic delight and as the basis of an idea of beauty. But our consciousness could not be satisfied with looking upon a semblance only. The cry is, "This is but a show! Where shall I grasp thee, Infinite Nature?" Music, we are told, answers the question, because through it the external world speaks directly to our inner consciousness, just as, inversely, our inner consciousness, by means of the cry communicates directly with the external world. "As the cry emitted, be it sound of sorrow or delight, is the most immediate utterance of our Will, we incontestably understand similar sounds that reach our ear as utterances of similar emotions; and no illusion that the fundamental nature of the world external to us is not thoroughly identical with our own, as it appears in the glare of light, is possible here; whereby the gulf that seems to exist to the sight vanishes at once."

Having reached this point in his interesting demonstration, and established music as the direct medium between the two worlds of the inner man and external things, Wagner proceeds to show that the art of music must be subject to æsthetic laws quite different from those of any other art. Æstheticians cannot understand an art based upon a pathological element, and they recognise music as such only when clothed in the "somewhat frigid formality" peculiar to the plastic arts. But they might do better than this by simply watching an inspired musician's mode of production. The plastic artist first perceives an object, and then, in the creation of its semblance, elevates it to an idea. The musician perceives nothing external to himself. "His music is itself an Idea of the world, wherein the world immediately exhibits its essential nature" without the mediation of cognition. The plastic artist quiets an individual Will, while pure perception takes place; but in the musical artist the individual Will recognises itself as universal, and as "above all barriers of individuality, for in the ear a portal is opened through which the world finds access to the Will, and the Will to the world." Upon this Wagner bases a remarkable and passionate utterance: "This prodigious overflowing of all barriers of phenomenality must necessarily evoke an incomparable ecstasy in the inspired musician, wherein the Will recognises itself as the all-powerful and universal Will; it is not to be restrained silently before perception takes place; it proclaims itself aloud as a conscious Idea of the world. There is but one state which can surpass the musician's—the state of the Saint: and that especially because it is enduring and incapable of being clouded, whilst the ecstatic clairvoyance of a musician alternates with an ever-recurring state of individual consciousness, which must be thought all the more miserable as, in the inspired state, he was lifted higher above the barriers of individuality. And by reason of the sufferings with which he has to compensate for the ecstasy in which he is enabled so inexpressibly to rapture us all, the musician may appear worthier of reverence than other artists, indeed almost as possessing a claim to veneration."

But how is the musician to give an intelligible description of his inner perceptions? Wagner answers the question by reference to a most interesting hypothesis of his favourite philosopher, who surmises that a dream of deepest sleep is apprehended by the waking brain through being, just before waking, translated into a lighter allegorical dream, having enough reference to the actual world to be understood therein. Similarly, the musician to become intelligible in outward expression approaches the external world and avails himself of the idea of time—rhythmical motion. "Whilst the harmony of tones, which pertains neither to time nor space, remains the veriest element of music, the musician, now actually moulding and shaping, stretches his hand, as it were, towards the waking world of phenomena by the rhythmical succession of time in his productions." And by doing so he makes music perceptible, because, as our author beautifully says, "human gestures, which in the dance are rendered intelligible by expressive and regularly alternating movement, appear to serve music in a manner akin to that in which bodies serve light, which would not be visible unless it could break against them."

Wagner contends that this approach of music to the world of perceptible phenomena involves a danger, since it invites the application of rules of criticism proper only to plastic art, and encourages the erroneous belief that music, like sculpture, for instance, has its object merely in the pleasure derived from a contemplation of beautiful forms. For a long time music was actually so regarded. "In point of fact music has been continually developed in this latter direction only by a systematic disposition of the rhythmical structure of its sections, which has brought it into comparison with architecture on the one side, and, on the other, has given it an obvious symmetry that has exposed it to false judgment in accordance with the analogy to the plastic arts already mentioned." But the true function of music is not to gratify by symmetry, but to close our eyes to the outer world, and make us look inwards "as into the essential nature of all things." There was need, consequently, of a man powerful enough to use external forms so as to show their inner significance, and such a man was Beethoven. The work of this "true representative musician" was to establish music on its true basis, and properly reconcile its character as a revelation of the essential nature of things with the outward aspect which, for the sake of intelligibleness, it is obliged to assume. There could be no nobler task, because "when the inner spirit of music is enfeebled for the sake of a regular order of rhythmical divisions akin to a row of columns, our attention will be riveted by an outward regularity only, and we shall of necessity lower the standard of our requirements as to music itself, inasmuch as we refer it to that external regularity. Thus music descends from its state of sublime innocence . . . it no longer proclaims the essential nature of things, but becomes itself involved in the illusions pertaining to external phenomena. For with such music people want to see something, and that which is to be seen becomes the main concern, as the opera shows clearly enough, when the 'spectacle,' the 'ballet,' &c., constitute the attraction, and thus induce the degeneracy of the music employed to show them off."

Having shown the necessity for Beethoven, Wagner proceeds to discuss the development of his genius.

But this part of the work demands a notice by itself; and, for the sake of this alone, so masterly, so appreciative, and in many respects so convincing, have we now endeavoured to give our readers an intelligible epitome of the philosophical introduction, apart from which the Beethoven argument cannot be well understood. It is, perhaps, too much to hope that we have condensed the reasoning of our author with the lucidity required by so abstract a theme, but if the chief lines have been made clear, the result, when we follow Wagner through the remaining pages of his book, will not be valueless. For the present there is only to add that, because we have not criticised the philosophy of music as here set forth, it does not follow that every part of it is unassailable. But Wagner's philosophy is not the point. We may allow our author his preliminaries, and take him up when real work begins.

THE MUSIC OF THE GIPSIES.

By Carl Engel.

Gipsy music has not unfrequently been adopted or imitated by modern composers. There is no need to point out examples, since it may be supposed that some will occur at once to the reader. The expedient is, however, not new. About a century ago, Joseph Haydn, when residing in Hungary, had his attention drawn to the performances of Gipsy bands, and he took hints from them for some of his compositions. In the beginning of the present century, Franz Schubert reproduced Gipsy music in certain of his works. Again, Carl Maria von Weber, in his charming "Preciosa," composed in the year 1820, has made use of a genuine Gipsy melody for his March and Overture. Other noteworthy instances could be cited. Nor must be left unnoticed the interest which the pursuits of the Gipsies possess in an ethnological point of view. However, enough has probably been said to convince the reader that an investigation of the genuine Gipsy music is likely to prove useful to musicians.

Before attempting this investigation, it may be advisable to become a little nearer acquainted with the interesting vagabonds who own the music.

The original home of the Gipsies is Western Hindustan. They migrated to Europe between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. Having been for some centuries in Turkey, they came to Hungary about the year 1400. They made, it is supposed, their first appearance in England in the year 1480. They are now spread in small hordes not only through most European countries, but they have also crossed the Atlantic, and are met with in Brazil and other countries of America. Their talent for music is renowned. Especially in Hungary and Roumania they are often professional musicians, and the instrumental bands perambulating these countries are frequently entirely made up of Gipsies, who play the wild and characteristic national tunes of the Magyars and the Wallachians. In Russia they excel as vocal performers, and in Spain the Gipsy singers and instrumentalists of Andalusia entertain the people with the bolero, fandango, and other Spanish national tunes. However, they are not only remarkable as performers; they are also composers.

The Gipsies on the Continent call themselves Sinte, a term the original meaning of which is unknown, but which is by some ethnologists supposed to refer to Sinde in Western India. They call themselves also Manusch ("homo"); Dadesko tschawo ("The father's son"); Galo ("The dark one"); and most commonly Rōm ("Man"). The different names by which they are designated in European countries are explicable from the extravagant notions which formerly prevailed respecting the original home of these restless wanderers. In fact, it is only during the present century that their history has been ascertained. The French call them Bohémiens, and the people in Bohemia call them Cykans. In Russia they are called Tzügans; in Hungary, Czigány, and also Pharao Nephek ("Pharaoh's people"); in Italy, Cingari; in Spain, Gitános; in Turkey, Chenguins; in Germany, Zigeuner and Tattern. The designation Zigeuner is perhaps a corruption of Czigány; at any rate, some German literary records of the fifteenth century have Sagüner and Zyginer, which rather suggests a derivation from the Magyar language, especially as the Gipsies came first to Germany from Hungary. As regards Tattern (also in Low-German occurring as Taters), there can be no doubt that it designates Tartars, since this name is applied to any wild Pagan horde coming from the East.

In England the Gipsies were supposed to be Egyptians; hence their name. Probably they themselves entertained or promulgated the notion that Egypt was their native land. They certainly seem to have maintained this in Germany, where they arrived, in the year 1417, constituting a large horde under the leadership of a so-called king, whose name was Zundel. The popular belief was that they had been condemned to rove about in the world because their forefathers had refused to give shelter to the Virgin Mary and Child after she had fled to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. Since that memorable event, every seven years a horde of them was irresistibly compelled to quit the country. When the simple-minded peasants asked them whether this was really true, they generally replied that there could not be the slightest doubt about it. Being naturally of a shrewd and quick conception, they were ready to foster any superstitions as well as feelings of sympathy evinced by the people with whom they happened to come into contact.

However, their pretext for leading a vagabond life seems to have soon fallen into discredit in Germany. Subsequently, their pilfering habits and their supposed powers of sorcery incited the molested country people to hunt them down like wild beasts.

Without noticing in detail the various statements which are recorded concerning their origin, attention must be drawn to a curious assertion made by Professor Dr. Johannes Christopherus Wagenseil, in his treatise on the Meistersingers, written in German, and published at Nürnberg in the year 1697. The learned author, whose opinion was probably shared by other German scholars of the seventeenth century, states that the Gipsies are disguised Jews. About the middle of the fourteenth century, he says, an awful pestilence spread over almost all European countries, and devastated whole villages and towns in some districts of Germany. Persons apparently in full health and vigour were suddenly attacked by it, and died in a few hours. Nobody could account for the origin of this dreadful visitation. Unfortunately, after some time the terrified people began to suspect that the Jews had poisoned the wells, and thus caused the plague. The suspicion spread like the calamity, and led to a persecution of the Jews. They were chased, tortured, and slain without mercy. Those who succeeded in escaping the clutches of the infuriated people took refuge in the mountains, and hid themselves in subterranean caves. In these hiding-places they remained undisturbed for about half a century, until the pestilence had subsided, and their persecutors had died or had forgotten them. During their seclusion they contrived a new dialect of their own; and when they at last ventured to leave their hiding-places, under the guidance of King Zundel, in the year 1417, they thought it prudent to deny that they were Jews, and they called themselves Zigeuner (or Zigeiner, as the learned Doctor spells the word). Among the proofs of their being Jews he notices certain words in their language which he recognises as Hebrew words. Zundel, the name of the Gipsy king, has, he says, the same meaning as the Hebrew name Menahem ("Consoler.") He points out that many of the Gipsies have proper names which signify certain animals, and that Jacob on his death-bed blessing his children (Genesis xlix.) calls Judah a lion, Naphtali a hind, Benjamin a wolf, and Issachar an ass.

This statement would be simply ridiculous did it not reveal a sad example of misery inflicted by ignorant and superstitious people upon their fellow-creatures. Moreover, it is noteworthy inasmuch as it shows how impenetrable was the mystery of the origin of the Gipsies even to scholars.

As regards the Jews, they certainly have this in common with the Gipsies, that they also are a dispersed oriental race, scattered over almost the whole habitable world, and that they also have retained some peculiar characteristics in their musical performances. Besides, there exists this resemblance between the two races, that the Jews as well as the Gipsies evince an extraordinary fondness for cultivating the musical art. In fact, many of our distinguished musicians are Jews—perhaps not as regards religion, but certainly as regards race. It would be interesting to compare the genuine Jewish music with the genuine Gipsy music. However, such an attempt does not come within the plan of this essay. Suffice it here to point out that the kind of music which may be designated as genuine Jewish is probably less to be found in the chants of the synagogue than in certain secular songs. There are in Galicia, Roumania, Poland, and Russia towns and villages which are inhabited almost exclusively by Jews. These people, who strictly preserve the ancient manners and customs of their race, speak a peculiar dialect, known as Jüdisch-Deutsch, which is a compound of German, Hebrew, and Russian. Some airs of these Jews, which were collected in Poland, have been published. The traveller, J. G. Kohl ("Reisen im Innern von Russland und Polen," Dresden, 1841; part iii., p. 51), relates how in the town of Stanislawow, in Galicia, he entered late in the night a wine-house, where he found a room full of Jews, finely dressed in silken talars (long gowns reaching to the ankles), and having beautiful black beards, who in high spirits were singing drinking-songs, the tunes of which appeared to him highly characteristic.

To return to the Gipsies. Before describing their musical performances, I shall endeavour to give some account of their instruments. In Hindustan, Gipsy bands are met with which probably still play instruments precisely like those which the European Gipsies had before they adopted those of the countries to which they migrated. Captain L. von Orlich ("Travels in India and the Punjab," London, 1845; vol. i., p. 153) met in the vicinity of Bhawulpoor a Gipsy band which had encamped under their reed huts on the outskirts of a village: "They busied themselves during the day with platting, but were playing the livelong night on their musical instruments, to the great enjoyment of the villagers, who were all up, dancing and singing." Although the Gipsies perambulating European countries do not possess particular musical instruments of their own invention, they have preserved in their language certain names of instruments which are suggestive, inasmuch as they indicate a former possession of oriental instruments. The most remarkable ones are pointed out in the following list of musical terms occurring in the language of the Gipsies:—

Sarengro, or surhingro. An old name of a stringed instrument. According to the statement of an English Gipsy, the term denotes the head or scroll of a violin. Perhaps it meant originally the sarungi, a stringed instrument played with a bow, which is still popular in India, and which may be regarded as the principal fiddle of the Hindus.

Bosh, also called bóshoméngro or bóshoméngri. The name given to the violin by the Gipsies in England. The word bosh is supposed by C. G. Leland ("The English Gipsies and their Language," London, 1873; p. 86) to be from the Persian or from the Sanskrit. It may possibly be a corruption of the French pochette, signifying a small violin of an old-fashioned shape which perambulating musicians and dancing-masters formerly carried in their pockets. However, this conjecture appears to be refuted by the fact that the English Gipsies use the word bosh also to designate "music," which the German Gipsies call pash (or, written in German, pasch). The word may, therefore, have been derived from the Persian, if it is not from the Turkish language, as is generally supposed.

Welljüna. The Gipsies in Germany and other districts of Central Europe call the violin welljüna.

Schetra. A name given to the violin by the Gipsies in Germany. The word schetra suggests a Hindu origin. The instrument chatura, or choutara, in use in India at the present day, has, however, wire-strings, which are twanged. It derives its name from cha, "six," and tar, "string." It resembles the sitar, likewise popular in India; but it is, as its name implies, six-stringed.

Paschemáskri. The guitar. Also the violin is sometimes called paschemáskri; and the term zerda-pángëri-páschemáskri implies a stringed instrument of any kind.

Pajandi. The guitar of the Gipsies in Spain. It is generally used in combination with a tambourine to accompany songs.

Gaschtëni-paschemáskri. The harp. Also the lute, and even the pianoforte, are sometimes so called by the Gipsies on the Continent, if they happen to see any such instrument, which they do not use in their musical bands. The meaning of gaschtëni-paschemáskri is "wooden instrument." The harp is well-known to the Gipsies in Germany. Richard Liebich ("Die Zigeuner," Leipzig, 1863) says that they are in the habit of drawing the figure of a harp on the wall of the room in which they have slept, or of cutting it in the bark of a tree near to the place where they have rested during the night in the open air, and he points to this custom as a proof of their great fondness for music.

Kobza. A kind of lute used by the Gipsies in Wallachia and Moldavia. The instrument is, however, also used by the Slavonic inhabitants of Roumania, the Ukraine, and Poland. Still, the name may be very old in the language of the Gipsies, since the people of Khiva, in Central Asia, have a somewhat similar stringed instrument called koboz; and the Kalmuks in Russia, who are Mongols, have a kind of lute which they call kobas.

Cimbalom. The dulcimer. This word is evidently borrowed from the Magyar language. The Persian name of the dulcimer is santir.

Guremi. The double-bass. From guro, "the ox," on account of its deep sound.

Risserpáskri-paschemáskri. The hurdy-gurdy.

Portámáskri. A flute. However, this word is more commonly used to designate any wind-instrument, whatever its construction may be.

Naiu. A pipe or flute. This is evidently the Arabic and Persian designation nay. Considering that the Gipsies lived in Persia several centuries before they came to Europe, it is not surprising to find in their language Arabic-Persian names of musical instruments. It is, however, possible that they adopted them in Turkey, where the Persian instruments are also in use.

Gaschtèni-portámáskri. The flute. The meaning of this word, literally translated, is "wooden instrument for blowing."

Tschambōna. A pipe; especially a pipe with a double reed or a chalumeau (English, shalm). The word tschambōna is perhaps a corruption of zampogna, which in Italian designates a bagpipe, but which formerly designated also a reed-pipe without a bag.

Papinákri-men (i.e., "goose-neck"). The clarionet. It is called papinákri-men because its upper portion resembles, in the opinion of the Gipsies, the neck and head of a goose.

Foretschka. The bassoon.

Portapáskĕro-gano. The bagpipe.

Rissermáskri, or rissermáskri-paschemáskri. The barrel-organ.

Kangriakri-paschemáskri. The church-organ.

Moscalu. The syrinx, or Pandean pipe of the Gipsies in Hungary and Transylvania. The Arabic and Persian name of the Pandean pipe is muskal, or miskul. In Roumania it is called multanka. The Gipsy musical bands, called Lautari, which perambulate Wallachia and Moldavia, play chiefly the kobza already mentioned, and the multanka.

Zerdapáskĕri-paschemáskri. The accordion or concertina. These modern instruments are now sometimes played with much skill by the Gipsies in Southern Germany. Also the Jew's-harp is successfully cultivated by them.

Shing. The horn. This name is evidently very old. It is the seeng of the Hindus. The Gipsies blow the shing and discharge firearms when a horde buries its deceased chief. The Hindus blow the seeng at the interment or cremation of their dead.

Sapjengeri-portámáskri. The trumpet. The meaning of the name, literally translated, is "serpentine-shaped wind-instrument." Also the French horn is sometimes thus designated.

Tambuk. A drum. The name appears to be identical with the Persian tambik. The Arab-Egyptians have a little hand-drum called darabouka.

Baro-tambuk. A large drum; also a kettle-drum.

Wasto-bósheméngro. A drum. This designation is used by the Gipsies in England.

Krámbrookos. A drum of the Gipsies in England.

Kooroméngri. A tambourine of the Gipsies in England.

Gampána. A bell. Perhaps from campana, mediæval Latin. The Italians still, at the present day, call the bell campana.

The Gipsies call music pash, and the musician pasche páskĕro; the song, gichepenn; and the dance, kellapenn. The Gipsies in Spain call the song gachapla.

The Hungarian Gipsy musicians are especially renowned as skilful players on the cimbalom (dulcimer). However, they not unfrequently distinguish themselves as violin-players. Some of these violinists have enjoyed an almost European reputation. Barna Michaly, about the middle of the last century, played the violin so admirably that Cardinal Count Emerich von Eschky had his portrait painted, inscribed "The Orpheus of the Gipsies." Again, Esinka Panna, a Gipsy girl, about the year 1770, excelled so greatly on the violin that the enraptured Magyars built a fine house for her to live in. She preferred, however, to live in a tent with her relations. The most celebrated violinist of the Hungarian Gipsies, T. Bihary, lived in the beginning of the present century. He is probably surpassed by E. Reményi, a modern Gipsy violinist of celebrity.

F. Liszt ("Des Bohémiens et leur Musique en Hongrie," Paris, 1859) expresses the opinion that the national music of the Magyars is, properly speaking, the music of the Gipsies, with whom it originated, and who are at the present day its principal performers and cultivators. Some other musicians, probably more from relying upon the statement of the celebrated Liszt than from investigations of their own, have said the same. The correctness of this opinion is, however, rather confuted by what may be called "circumstantial evidence." If the Hungarian music were the original music of the Gipsies, traces of it would probably be found in that of the Gipsies in other European countries—at least in those where many Gipsies exist, as for instance, in Spain and in Russia. It is, however, a well-known fact that in Spain and in Russia their music is different from that of the Hungarians. Again, a collection of ancient songs of the Magyars, published in the year 1859 by Gabriel Mátray, at the request of the Hungarian Academy, shows that the Magyars possessed in the beginning of the sixteenth century many songs which exhibit the characteristics prevalent in their present music. Considering how long a time it must take to transform the national music of a country, however favourable the circumstances for the admission of innovations may be, it is not likely the Gipsies should have achieved this during the comparatively short period which elapsed between their arrival in the latter half of the fourteenth century until the beginning of the sixteenth century.

Be this as it may, it hardly admits of a doubt that certain peculiarities in the performance of the Hungarian music are truly Gipsian. This is especially the case with the introduction of certain embellishments into an air, as regards the performances of Gipsy violin and dulcimer players. Their inclination and talent for thus varying the theme may be observed with Gipsy musicians in different European countries. B. C. Smart and H. T. Crofton ("The Dialect of the English Gipsies," London, 1875; p. 297) remark: "With our English Gipsies the favourite instruments are the tambourine and the bóshoméngri or fiddle, especially the latter, and we know several good executants on this instrument. One of the most gifted and renowned violinists among the Gipsies, in recent times, was a man named Horsery Gray, who died some years ago. We have been told by a Gipsy that when Horsery Gray had heard a tune he could play it off straightway, putting in such variations, grace-notes, shakes, and runs, that none of his confrères could compare with him. He played entirely by ear and not from notes."

Now this kind of performance is exactly what we find with the common musicians in Hindustan. Not only in instrumental compositions, but even in songs they observe the same method. Captain Willard ("A Treatise on the Music of Hindustan," Calcutta, 1834; p. 34) remarks: "The peculiar nature of the melody of Hindustan not only permits, but enjoins the singer, if he has the least pretension to excel in it, not to sing a song throughout more than once in its naked form; but, on its repetition, which is a natural consequence occasioned by the brevity of the pieces in general, to break off sometimes at the conclusion, at other times at the commencement, middle, or any certain part of a measure, and fall into a rhapsodical embellishment, called alap; and, after going through a variety of ad libitum passages, rejoin the melody with as much grace as if it had never been disunited, the musical accompaniment all the while keeping time. These passages are not reckoned essential to the melody, but are considered only as grace-notes introduced according to the fancy of the singer, where the only limitations by which the performer is bound are the notes peculiar to that particular melody, and a strict regard to time."

In order to enable the reader to judge for himself in how far this description of the Hindu musical performances is applicable to those of the Gipsies, I shall presently give some examples in notation, which were committed to paper in Hungary and Transylvania.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. VI.—MENDELSSOHN (concluded from page 167).

Continuing the brief glimpses of Mendelssohn's nature afforded us by his last letters, we discover him, in the first place, deprecating too much fuss about individual artists. In December, 1842, the Bach monument at Leipzig approached completion, and our master, writing to his mother, describes it in glowing terms: "The whole structure, with its numerous elegant decorations, is really typical of the old fellow. It is now covered up again, and will remain so till March, when it is to be inaugurated on his birthday by one of his motetts. Cedars are to be planted round the monument, and a Gothic seat placed in front of it. We are anxious, however, not to make too much fuss on the subject, and to avoid the present pompous style of phraseology, and the worship of art and artists which is now so much the fashion. The outward aspect of things with us is now as much too flourishing as it formerly was too miserable, which would be very pleasant for us, but it does harm to the cause. Art is becoming spoiled and sluggish, so that we should rather be grateful to our present enemies than angry with them." From Mendelssohn, of whom all things combined to make a "spoiled child," this testimony is remarkable, and proves that whatever influence the favours of fortune may have exerted upon him, he was never blind to the fact that great things are done in storm and stress, and that when a cause has to struggle for life it is most alive, in this resembling the oak, which takes a firmer grip of the soil as the winds of heaven blow upon it in anger.

The letter from which the foregoing extract is taken was, apparently, the last Mendelssohn ever wrote to his beloved mother. In the same month she died, and we now find her son addressing his brother Paul, with reference to the event, in terms that, for unstudied pathos, command warmest sympathy. The fact had dawned upon him, in the midst of a deep sense of bereavement, that he and his brother and sisters were no longer children, and it added to the grief of his sensitive nature: "I wrote to you the day after my arrival here that we were all well, and living in our sorrow as we best could, dwelling on the happiness we once possessed. My letter was addressed to Fanny but written to you all, though it seems you had not heard of it; and even this trifle shows what will daily be more deeply and painfully felt by us—that the point of union is now gone at which we could always know ourselves to be children, though no longer so in years. When I wrote to my mother I knew that I wrote to you all, and you knew it too. We are children no longer, but we have enjoyed what it is really to be so. Now this is gone for ever. At such a time we cling to outward things from hour to hour, like people in a dark room groping to find the way. . . . My next visit to Berlin will be a severe trial to me; indeed, all I say and do is a trial to me—anything in short that is not mere patient endurance. I have, however, begun to work again, and that is the only thing which relieves me a little. Happily, I have some half-mechanical work to do—transcribing, instrumentation, and similar things. This can be accomplished by a kind of animal instinct, which we can follow, and which does us more good than as though we had it not. But yesterday I was obliged to conduct. That was terrible. They told me the first time would inevitably be so; but sooner or later it must be done. I thought so too, but would fain have waited a few weeks. The first thing was a song of Rochlitz's, but when the altos sang, piano, 'As the hart pants,' I was so overcome that I was obliged afterwards to go out of the room to give free vent to my tears. . . . Farewell, dearest brother. Continue to love me." Words like these speak for themselves to all who have passed through like experience. A few days later Mendelssohn was requested by his friend, Professor Köstlin, to be the godfather of his new-born son. Köstlin did not then know of the master's loss, and with infinite consideration Mendelssohn began a letter of reply, determined to say nothing calculated to damp the parent's joy. What a lovable affectation of gaiety runs through his words! "That I am to be godfather is then settled; but there are a thousand things I still wish to know, and if, when the christening is over, you do not write to me all the details omitted in this letter, you must expect a good scolding. You forget I have myself three children, so I am doubly interested in such things. You do not even mention the name the boy is to have, nor whether he is dark or fair, or has black or blue eyes. My wife is as desirous as I am to know all this, and we hope that after the christening you will write to us every particular." The heart of the master was too full to continue long in this vein. His thoughts reverted to the dead mother, and all the craving for sympathy came out in words: "We have recently had a bitter, heavy loss to bewail—that of my dear mother. I intended to have written in a gay mood all through this letter, and not by a single word to allude to anything that, through its melancholy nature, might disturb your happiness, but I feel that I must write this to you, otherwise all that I have said would appear to me like mere hypocrisy. You must therefore, take part in my sorrow, for I could not conceal from you the event that, during the last few weeks, has so bowed us down by grief, from which it will be long before we recover. Yet such a letter as yours is welcome at all times and in all sorrow, and just as I know how you will feel towards me on hearing this so you know how cordially I sympathise with your joy. This may well be called a close union."

Through all trouble Mendelssohn found relief and consolation in the practice of his art. Take as proof the following extract from a beautiful letter to Carl Klingemann: "I cannot as yet at all reconcile myself to distraction of thought and every-day life, as it is called, or to life with men who, in fact, care very little about you, and to whom what we can never forget or recover from is only a mere piece of news. I now feel, however, more vividly than before what a heavenly calling Art is; and for this also I have to thank my parents, Just when all else which ought to interest the mind appears so repugnant and empty and insipid, the smallest real service to Art lays hold of your inmost thoughts, leading you so far away from town and country, and from earth itself, that it is indeed a blessing sent by God. A few days previous to the 11th I had undertaken to transcribe my 'Walpurgis-Night.' . . . Then I was summoned to Berlin, and after an interval of some weeks I have now begun to write the instrumental parts in my little study, which has a pretty view of fields and meadows and a village. I sometimes could not leave the table for hours, I was so fascinated by pleasant intercourse with the old familiar oboes and violas and other instruments, which live so much longer than we do and are such faithful friends. I was too sorrowful and the wound too recent to attempt new compositions, but this mere mechanical work and employment in Art was my consolation the whole time I was alone, when I had not my wife and children with their beloved faces, who make me forget even music, and cause me daily to think how grateful I ought to be to God for all the benefits He bestows on me." Something like the spirit of the old biblical saint shines through the foregoing words—"Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

In 1844 Mendelssohn made what he called a "glorious" visit to England, chiefly for the purpose of conducting at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. "I never was anywhere received with such universal kindness as on this occasion, and I had more music in two months than elsewhere in two years." But he was as pleased as a child to get back to Germany and rejoin his family, who were rusticating at Soden, near Frankfurt-on-the-Main. How he enjoyed repose there amidst his beloved ones he tells us himself with the freshness and naïveté of a youth: "I am sitting here at the open window, looking into the garden at the children, who are playing with their 'dear Johann' (Mendelssohn's servant). The omnibus to Königstein passes this twice every day. We have early strawberries for breakfast; at two we dine, have supper at half-past eight, and by ten we are all asleep. . . . The country is covered with pear-trees and apple-trees, so heavy with fruit that they are all propped up; then the blue hills and the windings of the Main and the Rhine; the confectioner, from whom you can also buy bread and shirt-buttons; the well-spring No. 18, which is called the Champagne Spring; the Herr Medicinalrath Thilenius; the list of visitors, which comes out every Saturday, as Punch does with you; the walking postman, who before going to Frankfurt calls as he passes, to ask what we want, and next day brings me my linen back; the women who sell cherries, with whom my little four-year-old Paul makes a bargain or sends them away, just as he pleases; above all, the pure Rhenish air—this is familiar to all, and I call it Germany." In the same happy vein he addresses his sister Fanny: "My family improve every day in health, while I lie under apple-trees and huge oaks. In the latter case, I request the swineherd to drive his animals under some other tree, not to disturb me; further, I eat strawberries with my coffee at dinner and supper; I drink Assmannshauser, rise at six o'clock, and yet sleep nine hours and a half (pray, Fanny, at what hour do I go to bed?). . . . Then towards evening . . . we stroll through the fields near home for a quarter of an hour, and find fault with the system of the world, utter prophecies about the weather, and are unable to say what is to become of England in the future. . . . Jesting apart, the contrast of these days with my stay in England is so remarkable that I can never forget it. There during three weeks not a single hour unoccupied; here the whole of the bright days free, without employment of any kind except what I choose for myself, and what is not done to-day is done to-morrow, and there is leisure for everything. In England, this time, it was indeed wonderful; but I must describe to you when we meet each concert there, and each bramble bush here." All this exuberance of delight has its pathetic side. It shows how tremendous was the strain Mendelssohn had imposed upon himself, and we may see in the so grateful rest at Soden the forethrown shadow of the eternal rest upon which, three years later, the master entered.

There are a few more such letters as those in which we have just seen how Mendelssohn's pure soul revelled in association with his family, with nature, and with the God whom he saw in every good thing. But, as the end draws near, more and more of gravity, of anxiety for peace and goodwill, and of earnestness in the pursuit of high and noble aims, becomes apparent. At this time Germany was much distracted by religious questions that gave Mendelssohn no little anxiety. Though not insensible to them, he refused to join in the strife, above all as a mere dilettante—a character for which, as usually found, he had nothing but contempt. His thoughts on the whole question are fairly expressed in a letter to Pastor Bauer acknowledging the receipt of a religious book: "The only point of view from which I can consider such questions is that of a learner, and I confess to you that, the older I become, the more I perceive the importance of first learning and then forming an opinion, not the latter previously to the former nor both simultaneously. In this I certainly differ much from very many leading men of the present day, both in music and theology. They declare that he alone can form a right judgment who has learned nothing, and indeed requires to learn nothing; and my rejoinder is that there is no man living who does not require to learn. I think, therefore, that it is more than ever the duty of every one to be very industrious in his sphere, and to concentrate all his powers to accomplish the very best of which he is capable; wherefore, the recent Church movements are more unknown to me than you probably believe (perhaps more than you would approve), but I rejoice that the very reverse is the case with you. I cannot, in fact, understand a theologian who at this moment does not come forward, or who feels no sympathy in these matters, but just as little do I comprehend many of those non-theologians whom I often see, and who talk of reformation and improvement, but are equally incompetent to know or understand either the present or the past, and who, in short, wish to introduce dilettanteism into the highest questions." These remarks suggest an idea that the Ne sutor ultra crepidam maxim may be carried too far in regard to such a personal and personally important matter as religion, but they serve to show the intense earnestness of Mendelssohn's spirit and the horror he had of dogmatising on questions imperfectly understood. A propos, take an extract from a letter to his brother: "It is shameful in me not to have thanked you yet for the beautiful copy of Dahlmann, but it is still more shameful that such ordinary—not extraordinary—but honest, able, true words are so seldom met with in our Fatherland, the cause of which is that mediocrity, or worse, vapid superficiality, is so prevalent in Germany, parading itself till we would fain drive it out of sight. And this is also why I have been hitherto prevented from even thanking you. I never yet encountered such a mob of strangers and of inquiries and proposals all entirely worthless; many so modest, many so immodest. Singers, players, a fine heap of compositions, and scarcely one that can be called even moderately good; but at the same time overflowing with the longest words, full of national pride, full of—anything but striving after high aims, though pretending to the highest of all." In such words did this lofty nature, fast ripening for the greatest of all realities, deal with the shams and quacks of his day.

General Grant's famous aspiration, "Let us have peace," was always in its spirit characteristic of Mendelssohn, and never more so than during the last years of his life. He shunned all quarrels, and was more than ready to pass over an affront when that could be done without loss of self-respect. We see this combined gentleness and magnanimity illustrated by an event which took place in the year 1846. It is notorious that the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society was at that time most undisciplined. The iron rule of a Costa had not then taught orchestral players what subordination meant, and some of those engaged at the Philharmonic in 1844 went so far as to make insolent remarks upon the tardiness with which one day Mendelssohn put in an appearance. The result was that, in engaging the orchestra for the Birmingham Festival of 1846, these boors were passed over, as they deserved. In due course the fact reached Mendelssohn's ears, and greatly troubled him. Entirely free from vindictiveness, he could not approve any action based upon an assumption of the contrary. Hence he wrote to Moscheles in very earnest language: "Nothing is more hateful to me than the revival of old worn-out squabbles. It is quite bad enough that they should ever be in the world at all. Those of the Philharmonic I had quite forgotten, and they must on no account have any influence on the engagements for the Birmingham Festival. If people are left out because they are incapable, that is no affair of mine, and I have nothing to say against it; but if any one is to be left out because he made himself unpleasant to me, I should consider it a piece of injustice, and beg that this may not be the case. There is certainly no cause to fear that these gentlemen will again be troublesome; at least, I feel none, and do not believe that any one can do so. So I beg of you to let the affair proceed exactly as it would if I had no thoughts of coming to England. If it be really desired to show me consideration, the greatest favour that can be conferred on me would be not to take notice of any such personal considerations. I know you will be so good as to bring this subject under the notice of Mr. Moore, and I hope I shall hear nothing further of these obsolete stories, by my wishes being complied with and no sort of vindictiveness exercised. Otherwise I shall protest against it ten times at least by letter." Surely, if a certificate of character were needed for Mendelssohn, these brave and beautiful words would suffice.

The shadows darken as the end draws near, and the closing letters become more and more tinged with gravity or clouded by grief. At one time we find Mendelssohn consoling a father for the loss of a gifted musical son: "Far more could I appreciate the extent of this loss when I had become acquainted with the compositions which you so kindly sent me, in the name of your deceased son. Every one who is in earnest with regard to Art must indeed mourn with you, for in him a true genius has passed away—a genius that only required life and health to be developed in order to be a source of joy and pride to his family and a benefit to Art. . . . And all this was not to be! and thus everything in Art and in life remains inscrutable. . . . But I must thank you for having made me acquainted with those works, and for having written me those few lines, and I will waft my thanks after your son also for having destined these works for me. May Heaven grant you consolation, alleviate your grief, and one day permit you to rejoin your son, where it is to be hoped there is still music, but no more sorrow or partings." Not long after these touching words were written, the master's faithful servant died and was sincerely mourned. Writing to Carl Klingemann, Mendelssohn said: "You know that I valued him very highly, and can well understand that when I saw him suffer so much, and become worse and worse to the point of inevitable death, it put me in a grave mood that will last for a long time to come. His mother and sister did not arrive here till the day after the funeral. It distressed us very much to see them, and not to be able to say one consolatory word. Among his things, which were all in the most exemplary order, we found a letter to me containing his last will. I must show you this the next time we meet; no man, no poet, indeed, could have written anything more heartfelt, earnest, and touching. Then there was a great deal to do and arrange. . . . I write all this to you in detail because you are my one friend, and because you sympathise in all that really affects and concerns me."

The spring of 1847 came, and then Mendelssohn suffered the cruellest blow of all. His darling sister, the gifted Fanny Hensel, died, and he who was so soon to follow her never recovered from the stroke. We see a breaking heart in every sentence of the following extract from a letter to General von Webern: "Your letter did me good. . . . I thank you for it all, my dear, kind, faithful friend. It is indeed true that no one who ever knew my sister can ever forget her through life: but what have not we, her brothers and sister, lost? and I more especially, to whom she was every moment present in her goodness and love; her sympathy being my first thought in every joy; whom she ever so spoiled, and made so proud by all the riches of her sisterly affection, which made me feel all was sure to go well, for she was ever ready to take a full and loving share in anything that concerned me. All this, I believe, we cannot yet estimate, just as I instinctively believe that the mournful intelligence will be suddenly recalled, and then again I feel that it is true, but never, never can I inure myself to it. It is consolatory to think of such a beautiful harmonious nature, and that she has been spared all the infirmities of advancing age and declining life. But it is hard for us to bear such a blow with proper submission and fortitude. . . . My family are all well. The happy, unconcerned, cheerful faces of my children alone have done me good in these days of sorrow. I have not as yet been able to think of music; when I try to do so all seems empty and desolate within me. But when the children come in I feel less sad, and I can look at them and listen to them for hours." It was natural that in his affliction the master should turn with special love to his dead sister's son, and on the occasion of the young man's birthday he addressed to him a letter which, though Mendelssohn did not suspect it, was to be his last brave testimony in favour of a pure life and an exalted purpose. Thus it runs: "I must send you my good wishes on your birthday, the most mournful one you have yet known. The retrospect of its celebration last year will deeply grieve you, for then your mother was still by your side; may, however, the anticipation of the birthdays which you may yet be spared to see comfort and strengthen you! for your mother will stand by your side in these also, as well as in everything that you do or fulfil. May all your actions be estimable and upright, and may your daily steps be directed towards that path to which your mother's eyes were turned for you, and in which her example and her soul went with you, and always will go with you while you remain true to her—in other words, I trust, all your life long. Whatever branch of life, or knowledge, or work, you may devote yourself to, it is indispensable to will (not to wish, but to will) something good and solid; but this is sufficient. In all employments and in all spheres there is now, and ever will be, a want of able and honest workmen, and therefore it is not true when people declare it now more difficult than formerly to achieve anything. On the contrary, in a certain sense it is and always will be easy or altogether impossible. A genuine, faithful heart, true love, and a brave, determined will are alone required for this, and you will not assuredly fail in these with such a bright and beloved example steadily shining before you. But even if you do all in your power, still nothing is done, nothing is attained, without the fulfilment of one fervent wish that I send you this day—may God be with you."

In June, the Mendelssohn brothers, with their families, sought relief from sorrow in Switzerland, and there were, as Felix testified, "sometimes even cheerful." But only sometimes. The cloud that hung over our dear master was lightened but not dispersed, and who can tell what mysterious premonitions were his in the Valley of the Shadow of Death whither Providence had led him? or under what influence he wrote: "A great chapter is now ended, and neither the title nor even the first word of the next is written. But God will make it all right one day; this suits the beginning and the end of all chapters." But it was Mendelssohn's duty to "act in the living present," and he forthwith began to form plans for the chapter of the future. "In September, God willing," he wrote to his sister Rebecca, "I intend to come to Berlin, and Paul has probably told you how seriously I am occupied with the thought of spending my life with you, my dear sister and brother, and residing with you, renouncing all other considerations. . . . There is no lack of visitors here . . . but they all seem to me so empty and indifferent that I, no doubt, must appear in the same light to them, so I heartily wish that we may soon part and remain apart. In the midst of all the phrases, and inquiries, and speechifyings, one thought is always present with me—the shortness of life. I hope we shall be soon together and long remain together." This is the language of a man ripe for death, to whom the world and all its ambitions have become vanity, and who only desires to rest in the arms of a supporting love both here and on the other side of the dark river. How, shortly after Mendelssohn returned from Switzerland, he was stricken by illness, and how he rallied for a time, every reader knows. On October 25 he was so much better as to write to Paul about plans for the immediate future, but this turned out to be no more than the "lightening before death." Five days later he was again smitten down, and on November 4, his pure, brave soul went to its appointed place—the place reserved—who can doubt it?—for "the spirits of the just made perfect."

THE IMPROVEMENT OF SOUND.

By Dr. W. H. Stone.

Under the above rather questionable title, Mr. A. C. Engert exhibited to an appreciative audience at the Neumeyer Hall, on Saturday, March 6, his suggestions for improving the acoustic qualities of rooms and instruments.

The former of these subjects is one much neglected at the present time. It appears impossible to build a concert-room of which it can be said beforehand that it will prove favourable or the reverse to musical vibration. The case appears to be somewhat different according as the speaking voice or instrumental and vocal performances are contemplated, many rooms being good for the former which are absolutely unfit for the latter. A fair instance of this peculiarity is the St. George's Hall, Langham Place, which, though not exceptionally difficult to speak in, has the faculty of taking all tone and quality out of an orchestra or a chorus.

Indeed, such discrepancies are not to be wondered at when the number of factors included is considered. Rooms, and closed spaces generally, always have one predominant key-note, which may be either over-powerful or the reverse. Reflected echoes may predominate; or reflections from a long series of similar parts, returning with rhythmical repercussion, may produce the greatest of all impediments to articulate sound, namely, a musical echo. This is well illustrated by the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Other large rooms have foci, and concentrate instead of dispersing the sound. This occurs to a notable extent in the Albert Hall, a space elliptical in plan, cylindrical in elevation, which has a marked focus at the diagonal of the longest axis of the ellipse.

Other buildings, like St. Paul's Cathedral, fail simply from excessive sonority. Perhaps the worst of all have the defect of starting a selective resonance, which reinforces some sounds and damps others; for instance, the large school-room at the east-end of St. Paul's.

It is impossible, within a limited compass, even to name all the devices which have been at different times suggested for the cure or alleviation of so radical a difficulty. Screens, wires, curtains, hollow resonators, wainscoted walls, paper stretched on canvas, have all been tried, sometimes with good effect.

Mr. Engert relies on thin plates of steel freely suspended in the neighbourhood of the speaker or singer. He also utilises the well-known principle of suspended curtains.

Singularly enough he appeared at the demonstration named above to suppose that the simple drawing of a curtain across his resonating plates would prevent their action. Any one even moderately acquainted with the laws of aerial vibration will see through this fallacy, which divested the experiments of much cogency. A short statement of his views was circulated in the room, some of the items in which would hardly meet with unanimous approval from students of acoustics. The general effect produced upon the ear in various parts of the room was as follows, it being premised that the newly built Neumeyer Hall is far from bad for the speaking voice, though, in consequence probably of the coved and dormered roof, rather too resonant for singing or playing:—

1. The curtains assisted both speech and singing.

2. The steel plates, in speaking, had a slight but appreciable effect of the same kind. On the other hand, in loud singing or playing they clearly reinforced certain sounds to the exclusion of others, and continued it for two or three seconds independently. All staccato effects or sudden pauses were thus impracticable. The effect was that of a piano with the dampers lifted.

3. The plates when applied to the framework of a piano materially altered its tone for the worse, by producing the "tin-kettle quality" which is often heard on old instruments with hardened hammers, and which Helmholtz has shown to depend on remote and irrelevant upper partial tones. Moreover, they were apt to act as chorus to any accidental noise in the room or on the platform.

Their function seems to be limited to reducing excessive resonance by the principle of interference. Here they may prove useful, though great care must be exercised to keep them out of the reach of shaking movements or of malicious and busy fingers. On the slightest touch they are liable to produce a fine rolling peal of stage thunder.

The late King of the French, Louis-Philippe, when on a visit to the racing-stud of his son, the Duke of Orleans, remarked that, by a system of over-breeding, the legs of the animals had become so fine that in a few years there would be nothing left of them—inferring that the racehorse of the future might have no legs. When, in the language of latter-day musical criticism, we see a new pianoforte concerto characterised as "highly intellectual," we often wonder, like the practical-minded old monarch, whether the concerto of the future will have any music in it at all? We wish that the critics, in the interests of a science of æsthetics, the materials for which are so much wanted, would tell us distinctly what they mean by "highly intellectual music." We sometimes think that when referring to intellect they mean culture. They cannot mean a Bach-like solidity, either as to the ideas, the supports, or the tissues. None of these things are considered very essential in a modern concerto; and even in its origin the concerto was intended for executive display, which would to a certain degree exclude what we presume is generally meant by the "intellectual element" in music. In a very rigid or special sense of the word intellectual, the executant, taken as a type, is more intellectual than the composer. Composers, as a rule, play abominably, or not at all, which is far better. They are either deficient in those intellectual essentials in common life that are comprised in a prompt appreciation of time, weight, dimension, calculation, and in general habits of exactitude, or their natural excitability of temperament overpowers those qualifications. To the most stupid of their hearers they will interpret the inner sense of the music—if it has any sense—better than any one, but usually at the sacrifice of a few notes in the polyphony, and of a beat more or less in the time. Apollo himself went about with a lyre under his arm, but no one ever heard that he played particularly well; whereas many of the mere demigods and heroes were recognised experts, and probably much preferred not to hear him, and were content to play his music or the music he inspired. The great question to decide is, What is inspiration, and how far is it an outcome of intellectuality? It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that nine-tenths of musical composition is sheer imitation. In the remaining tenth—without binding ourselves to particular ratios—there resides the colouring matter we call inspiration, which separates and distinguishes the legitimate composition from patchwork. It is in the nine-tenths we look for the technical proficiency, culture, and cleverness or intellectual power of the musician; and in too many compositions we find nothing else. The colouring matter in any similar case is reflected or borrowed, and is part of the imitation which constitutes not a proportion but the whole merit of the composition. Are we then to understand by "highly intellectual music" music that is not only technically clever, but indicating a certain degree of cultivation? or are we to go a little further, and assume the critics mean that in the absence of direct inspiration the composer has at least set before him an ideal, the joint issue of his culture and natural refinement of taste? The obvious objection is that the very word "ideal" comprehends the emotional element. If there be such a thing as an "intellectual ideal" it can scarcely occur in music, for which the most we can claim is that, something like the light in the coal, it is the bottled-up expression of the emotions of all humanity, historic and prehistoric. Some philosophers extend the genealogy still further, and are probably right. The so-called intellectuality of music resides not in the conception but in the expression; and power, even in expression, depends on the strength of the emotional impulse. Intellectual energy will give precision and, so to speak, helm to the music, but not what is understood by power. That is proved over and over again by the numbers of technical proficients and in other respects vastly clever men who fail signally in composition. All we can make of it is, that "highly intellectual music" means highly refined music; and one hopes that music, like Louis-Philippe's horses, will not be ultimately refined off its legs. What is most wanted in the music, literature, and politics of the present day is stamina. Each generation has its particular 'ism. Surely that of the present generation is "lardydardyism."

THE power of music to cure has been proved in former times, but it has been reserved for the present day to prove its power to kill. We do not, of course, vouch for the facts; but news comes to us through a foreign paper that a duel has recently taken place at Valparaiso between two musical professors, the combatants agreeing to place themselves at their pianofortes, in the presence of their seconds, and to play uninterruptedly, without eating or drinking, for forty-eight hours. We are not informed whether the programme was strictly limited to a single piece; but one performer, it appears, chose the "Miserere," from "Il Trovatore," which he played one hundred and fifty times, but just as he had started for the hundred and fifty-first time his hold on the keys gradually relaxed, and he fell forward dead upon the instrument, his adversary, whose strength was thoroughly exhausted, being conveyed to the hospital in so precarious a state that his life is despaired of. But as it is also said that the arduous nature of the task imposed upon the seconds utterly prostrated their mental faculties, we find not only the fatal effects of continuous performance, but of continuous listening, exemplified in this singular duel. Now as we know that many persons suffer severely from being compelled to hear music for hours which they would willingly escape from, might not this infliction be organised as a punishment? Valparaiso, which has initiated this new form of mortal combat, should be the first to profit by its results. A prisoner, for example, who is pronounced guilty of some light crime, might be sentenced to listen to a disconnected, rambling symphonic piece for an hour and three-quarters, whilst a more hardened criminal might, in addition, be asked to say what it means. The time occupied in the performance of the music must of course be proportioned to the nature of the offence. A dreary orchestral work, lasting from early evening into the small hours of the night, for instance, should only be resorted to in very severe cases, and might well replace the lighter punishment of transportation for life.

UNDER the head of "Orchestral Notation" we have inserted a letter in the present number of our journal drawing attention to the absurdity of allowing a score to remain a "Chinese puzzle" to all but those who have, by a long course of study, discovered the key to the mystery. Our correspondent truly says that "music is the most conservative of all the arts"; but this is the very reason why the rising generation of composers should do all they can to push forward any reform which they conscientiously believe to be beneficial; and when we say that the writer of the communication referred to is a complete master of the subject upon which he comments, it will be at once seen that it is not for his own benefit that he wishes the matter simplified, but for the benefit of those who have still to unravel the mass of confusion which a score presents even to a tolerably educated musician. "It was long," he says, "before it was discovered that it would be as well to write the real notes for the drums as to write always C, G. How long will it be before the same discovery is applied to the horns and trumpets?" We may also ask how long it will be before the notes which are actually sounded will be written in the clarionet parts? Whilst on this subject, too, it would be good to inquire why, for example, when we write in G major a part to sound in E major we should say "Clarionet in A," when we really mean "A clarionet." Absurd as the system is, we do say what key the horns are to play in, and so with other transposing instruments. Seeing the necessity of allowing a score to appear to the eye of a student exactly as it sounds to the ear, Mr. Prout, in his excellent Primer on "Instrumentation," constantly writes the true instead of the false notes in his examples; and we will leave any unprejudiced reader to decide why this system should not be generally adopted. We shall be very glad if the observations of "F. C." should elicit opinions upon this important subject.

Rooted prejudices and old-world notions are always, as Charles the Second said of himself, "an unconscionably long time dying"; and it is not to be wondered at that some worthy people regard with alarm and disgust the clause in the new Educational Code which reduces the musical capitation grant to sixpence where the children are not taught singing by note. Heretofore the grant has been a shilling for singing, no matter how taught; and the new regulation is looked upon by a "Country School Manager," who writes to the Times, as the promotion of torture under the stimulus of a fine. Our country friend sees no end of mischief arising out of a measure that warmly commends itself to most others. In the first place, he tells us, the masters and pupil-teachers will demand an increased salary by way of compensation for having to learn the "Hullah system"—as though it were equivalent to a railway accident; and the ratepayers will be called upon to provide accomplishments for the children of the poor which many of them cannot afford for their own offspring. Were it not an obvious fact that ninety-nine out of every hundred children learn musical notation with ease and pleasure, that the actual teaching staff is sufficient for present requirements, and that the musical education given must be at best very elementary, there would be some reason in the letter of a "Country School Manager"—reason enough, at all events, to account for its appearance in the Times. As matters stand, we can only wonder why the complaint was ever written, and, still more, why it was inserted. But we should not forget that there are people living who believe the world is flat, contend that ignorance is a valuable quality in the "common people," argue that England should revert to Protection, and, to put the case comprehensively, need telling that Queen Anne is dead.

Experience proves to us that when a musical critic knows nothing whatever of the matter upon which he is writing two distinct methods are open to him: the first is to dash at once into the subject, using the most scientific terms, and braving the ridicule of those who really understand music; and the second is merely to catalogue the pieces done, with the patronising air of one who could write most learnedly upon the performance if he chose. We have from time to time given specimens, culled from provincial and American papers, of the former of these styles, the incomprehensible nonsense of which too often passes for "æsthetical criticism"; but have said little of the latter, although some good examples are constantly before us. One prominent peculiarity in these matter-of-fact notices is the constant use of the word "while." "Miss ——," for instance, "sang in a most expressive manner a charming song, while Mr. —— played a brilliant flute solo;" "Signor —— delighted everybody by his rendering of two vocal pieces, while Mrs. —— displayed her well-known talents in a pianoforte fantasia." Then in this style, too, the familiar and colloquial method of writing is usually adopted: "Mr. T——'s fine tenor voice was much admired," and (speaking of a double quartet) "Ladies and gents' voices," may be accepted as fair specimens, both quoted from a concert notice recently forwarded to us. But wonder will cease at any little eccentricity of criticism when we place upon record one of the items from the printed programme of the very performance of which we are speaking: "Caritina . . . From Robert C. Diable . . . Rossini." We propound this as a conundrum to our musical readers: we have given it up.

The thanks of all who love peace and quiet are certainly due to those persons who have banded themselves together into a Society for the Regulation of Street Music and the Suppression of Street Nuisances; but it must be obvious that they have set themselves a hard task. It is all very well to make it illegal "for any vendor of food or other commodity, any hawker of newspapers or other periodicals, or any other person to call, bawl, or cry his or her wares, merchandise or occupation, or otherwise to attempt to attract attention by making discordant noises, whether by the human voice, or by blowing horns or ringing bells"; but the attempt, not to suppress, but to "regulate" street music involves a difficulty which we scarcely think can have been sufficiently considered. Passing over the fact of many young people looking forward to the periodical visits of street musicians as a real pleasure —"baby's organ" being one of the events of the day —there can be no question that if open-air music by casual performers is to be permitted at all, it would be an utter impossibility to decide what instruments are to be played, where or when they may be heard, or what compositions are to be selected or forbidden. Stringent measures may certainly be taken for compelling persons to move away when their performance becomes an infliction; but it must be recollected that the best bands in our streets, although a source of gratification to many, are an intolerable nuisance to others; and it would be scarcely fair, therefore, to legislate upon the matter until some expression of public opinion is sought. If street noises are to be made illegal and street music legal we can scarcely see how the latter can be "regulated."

From time to time we hear of tempting baits held out to lure the public into commercial transactions having no relation to the boon thus put forth as an attraction. A window filled with "useful presents," for example, is displayed, and purchasers of tea in sufficient quantities are informed that they will be presented gratuitously with any of these articles they may please to select. Not to dwell upon the fact of a lemon ice being given to every holder of a box ticket at the (so-called) "English Opera House" in days long gone by, there can be little doubt that this same system is occasionally pursued in matters musical; but we cannot call to recollection any instance similar to one recently put forth. A prospectus is now before us of a Musical Library, every subscriber to which will be entitled to a share in a raffle for a number of articles the particulars of which are stated. Any member introducing three subscribers will receive another number for the drawing in this lottery. But more than this: all "old pupils" will be admitted at a reduction upon the usual terms, "or by instalments; and one Term's free tuition." We have no desire to inquire who this professor may be who thus endeavours to get back his old pupils as new ones; yet we cannot but be struck with the ingenuity of the plan. Moscheles tells us that when he went, as a boy, to Dionys Weber, to see whether he would take him as a pupil, the master firmly said "If he persists in using the circulating libraries, I have done with him for ever." Now, however, we find that you must belong to a circulating library in order to receive lessons: so it is evident that teachers differ.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

M. Massenet's Opera, "Le Roi de Lahore," with which this establishment opened on the 13th ult., is scarcely a work which improves upon acquaintance; and as its merits were fully discussed by us on its production last season, there can be no need now to do more than mention that in every respect the scenic effect—upon which, in fact, the Opera mainly relies for its attraction—is as magnificent and carefully studied as before. The principal characters were cast to the vocalists already identified with the parts; and Mdlle. Turolla and M. Lassalle again elicited the warmest demonstrations of applause, the last-named artist being enthusiastically encored for his exceptionally fine singing of the air "O casto fior." The principal event of the past month has been the return of Madame Albani, who, as the heroine in "Lucia di Lammermoor," received so warm a welcome as to enable her speedily to throw off the slight feeling of nervousness with which she commenced the part. Both in the quiet and impressive music and the agitated and declamatory scenes of this arduous character, Madame Albani showed a very decided advance upon all her previous efforts. In the contract scene her unexaggerated pathos and perfect command of her vocal resources thoroughly enlisted the sympathies of the audience, and the applause was loud and continuous. M. Engel, who was to have appeared as Edgardo, was unfortunately indisposed; and his place was supplied, at a short notice, by Signor Carpi. Madame Albani has since sustained the parts of Gilda in "Rigoletto," and the heroine in Gounod's "Faust," in both of which she achieved a perfect triumph. Many of the favourite vocalists have appeared in their favourite parts—Señor Gayarré as Fernando, in "La Favorita," again displaying his usual merits and defects—but we have nothing new to chronicle; and indeed the prospects of the season seem likely to make the critic's office a sinecure.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

The production of Dr. Bexfield's Oratorio "Israel Restored," on the 15th ult., may be considered almost as remarkable as a resurrection from the dead. Here was a work first brought out twenty-eight years ago, and since then utterly forgotten, while, the composer having been dead nearly twenty-seven years, only those whose business compels them to keep musical facts and dates in mind knew, till the occasion of which we now speak, anything concerning the name of Bexfield or the nature of his oratorio. That these facts are now common knowledge goes a long way to prove the comfortable truth that hope is the last thing a failing man should give up. Which of us, six months ago, dreamed of the reappearance of Dr. Bexfield and his "Israel Restored" in the midst of the living and active world? To what the phenomenon may directly be attributable we cannot say, but its first cause no doubt lies in a conviction that the restored work deserves a better fate than neglect, and its composer another recompense than oblivion. We are entirely of that opinion ourselves. Among English musicians few, by right of natural endowment, hold higher rank than Dr. Bexfield, while his oratorio, despite obvious faults, is a work of which no Englishman need be ashamed. This would, perhaps, have been clear long ago, had not Bexfield's life come to an untimely end.

The composer was a native of Norwich, and, like so many other men who have done good service in the field of music, entered the choir of the Cathedral as a boy, receiving his first training from the late Dr. Zachariah Buck. At an early age he removed to London, but not till the good opinion of his native city had been so far gained as to secure from the Choral Society there the acceptance of an oratorio on its completion in 1851. "Israel Restored" was performed by the Society early in 1852, and met with a flattering reception. Such was the interest taken in the young composer that, it is said, 2,000 persons attended the concert, and such was the effect produced by his work, that some of the leading men connected with the Festival to be held in the autumn of the same year determined to give it, if possible, a place in the programme of that solemnity. It happened, however, that the admirers of the late Mr. Pierson advocated a performance of his "Jerusalem," and for some time a struggle between the partisans of the two musicians went on. In the end a compromise was arrived at. Unable to reject either, the Committee escaped from the difficulty by producing both, and on Wednesday, September 22, 1852, Dr. Bexfield had the honour of conducting "Israel Restored" under circumstances of the most flattering nature, the whole strength of the company of solo vocalists being employed upon the work. The oratorio appears to have been, on the whole, justly treated by the leading critics. They pointed out its defects, but frankly allowed that the music was of a true sort, and gave promise of much future distinction for its young composer. This, of course, brought Dr. Bexfield into prominence, and opened up to him what seemed an easy and a pleasant path. But another fate was reserved for him by the All-disposing Power. In 1853 his health began to decline, and thirteen months after the grateful triumph at Norwich he passed away. The sad event was fatal to the oratorio. "Israel Restored" might have been buried in the grave of its author for aught that was seen of it, till, twenty-eight years later the action of faithful friends and admirers brought it out at the Albert Hall.

It is noteworthy that, at a time when "Elijah" was filling every mind with admiration for dramatic oratorio, Dr. Bexfield should have written a work in which the dramatic element is non-existent. He may, however, have mistrusted his power as a writer of such music, or, as was probably the case, have shrunk from the suspicion of rivalry with the greatest master of the time. Be this as it may, the libretto of "Israel Restored" deals with its subject in general terms, and though characters are introduced, such as an Israelitish woman, an angel, &c., they have no action, being created simply that words might be put into their mouths. An oratorio so constructed labours under manifest disadvantage. It lacks the interest of personality, its parts are necessarily strung together loosely, and it throws upon the composer the task of himself securing a success which the librettist does little or nothing to attain. This will appear the more clearly, with regard to "Israel Restored," when we have given an outline of the "argument."

"The first part contains the prophecies concerning the Israelitish nation, which are followed by God's awful threats and punishments for their disobedience and unbelief. At their scattered and desolate condition 'all the people sigh.' They pray that God will 'make their way plain,' and that their prayers may 'enter His presence.' The prophecies are then gradually developed. Israel is to 'return and be at rest,' and God will 'wipe away all tears from their eyes.' The Israelites become a happier race; they gather themselves together and sing, 'Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord,' acknowledging Him as their Father and Redeemer. The great end is then accomplished—Israel, being restored in peace and glory to their own land, break forth into joy and exclaim, 'Marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty, Hallelujah. Amen.'"

To say that Dr. Bexfield vanquished all the difficulties brought against him by the array of Scripture texts necessary to this argument, is to go somewhat beyond the truth. The interest, there can be no doubt, does flag from time to time, the result arising not only from the nature of the subject, but from Dr. Bexfield's perseverance in the use of long orchestral introductions and "ritornellas," which we only tolerate in Handel for Handel's sake. But, despite all this, and a number of minor faults for notice of which we have no space, the oratorio contains a mass of good wholesome music not to be rejected without the sin of waste. The overture is a very favourable example of the composer's skill, especially the fugue which, in accordance with Handelian precedent, constitutes its second movement. Here Dr. Bexfield's counterpoint, if not very elaborate, is fluent and effective, bespeaking a hand, to that extent at least, master of its craft. The composer shows to advantage from a scholastic point of view elsewhere. Take, for example, the unaccompanied quartet, "Lead me, O Lord," and the final chorus, "Marvellous are Thy works." As a whole, the choruses are the weakest part of the work, many of them suggesting that Dr. Bexfield lacked the experience and assurance necessary for the full exercise of his powers. But there are not unimportant exceptions to this rule, chief among them being "Thou hast mightily delivered Thy people," a number obviously inspired by Handel's "But as for His people," and, like that, closely approaching the sublime. We need only study this chorus to learn how great a loss English music suffered in 1853. With regard to the songs much more might be said than space now permits, for they supply the most conspicuous of all the meritorious features in the work. Dr. Bexfield had great command over simple, natural melody, and this served him continually in good stead. The first (tenor) air in the work, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets," affords an instance, and with it may be cited that for contralto, "O be favourable"; that for tenor, "God shall wipe all tears"; and that for soprano (with a charming accompaniment for horn, viola, violoncello, and double bass), "Thy sun shall no more go down." To sum up, "Israel Restored" is the work of a musician who had much experience to gain, but whose natural powers were equal to great things. Even as it stands, the oratorio should sometimes be heard, while there are many numbers that, in a detached form, would prove highly acceptable. On these grounds it is satisfactory to know that a cheap and handy edition of the oratorio has been issued by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

Concerning the performance of "Israel Restored," under Mr. W. Carter's direction, we have no desire to say much. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Mary Cummings, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Hilton, all of whom exerted themselves with the conscientiousness of true artists. The rest we pass.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS Choir limits itself to two Concerts per season, and the second for 1880 took place in St. James's Hall on Wednesday, the 21st ult. The present year has therefore no more to expect from Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's distinguished organisation, but the fact does not necessarily involve reason for complaint. In some quarters we find quantity without much quality, an ignoble result, to avoid which the Bach Choir goes as far as possible the other way, and gives quality without quantity. This is, beyond doubt, the better course of the two, and one worthy of imitation. The question may fairly be argued whether our musical societies do not, as a rule, attempt too much, and so make almost inevitable the slovenliness of which their achievements are often accused.

The programme of Wednesday's concert contained four works, two of which were new to the audience, had a place by themselves as the "first part," and permitted those who did not care for the more familiar "Meeresstille" of Beethoven, and "First Walpurgis Night" of Mendelssohn, to leave without the necessity of hearing either. The first of the novelties was a "Sanctus" in D by Sebastian Bach—one of a number written, not as part of the Catholic Mass, but for use in Lutheran worship. Some of these, as possessors of the German Bach Society's edition of the master's works well know, are published, and all of them, even though the one in D be "unquestionably the finest," should have a hearing now that the composer's style and method are popularly known and largely appreciated. With a view to Wednesday's performance the original scoring for violins, cornetto, violas, and organ was revised by Mr. E. Prout, and arranged for strings, wood-wind, and organ. Without prejudice to the question whether "meddling with the masters" is allowable, Mr. Prout's fitness for such work may be granted. He is sure to do it with reticence, preferring the sin of omission to that of commission, and his acquaintance with the composer supplies a guarantee against incongruous results. Hence the "Sanctus" has been rescored very well indeed, the keenest ears being vainly on the alert for examples of false judgment or bad taste. Of the work itself we cannot speak too highly. It is one of Bach's noblest inspirations: by which we mean, not so much an example of musical construction as of powerful expression. Profound science, when directed by equal genius, is often lost, so to speak, in the grandeur and strength of the emotions it serves to express and kindle. So in this case. Marked by all the subtle and masterful devices of a time when music was chiefly a system, the "Sanctus," as an utterance of feeling, rises higher and higher and spreads broader and broader till its power becomes irresistible. Its structure is an affair of learning; its strength is that of "thoughts that breathe and words that burn." Happy the master—indeed, rarely happy—who unites the learning and the strength, as here, into a perfect whole. The performance was distinguished by much vigour and earnestness, its effect upon those who could fix their attention amid a crowd of late-comers being proportionately great.

The production of Cherubini's great Mass deserves to rank among the most important events of the musical year, alike because of the character of the work and for the reason that, as far as can be ascertained, this performance was the first in England. Cherubini composed thirteen Masses, including three written at a very early age, and of the thirteen the one under notice is fifth in order, its date being 1811. We have represented here, therefore, a time in the master's life when he was in the hey-day of his powers, and this fact may not be altogether unconnected with the exuberance of ideas and amplitude of expression which distinguish the Mass above all others of the same kind. It is hard to tell of what Cherubini could have been thinking when he stretched this particular work over such a phenomenal number of pages. He was no Beethoven, living apart from practical considerations and following the bent of his genius no matter whither it led. And he must have known that a Mass so extended was, in effect, banished from Church use, save on special occasions, by its very size. These considerations, however, would have small weight were the various numbers of the work so written as to avoid redundancy. But this is not the case. On the contrary, there is a good deal of repetition which answers no apparent purpose, and only tends to weariness. Furthermore, the numbers are wanting in equality of merit. Some are magnificent in their sonorous grandeur, such as the "Gloria" and the opening movement of the "Credo"; and others, like the truly divine "Benedictus," are of heavenly beauty; but it is remarkable to us that when Cherubini comes to deal with the more solemn and impressive of Christian truths he disappoints expectation. Mass composers in all ages have found their greatest opportunity when treating the mystery of the Incarnation, the awfulness of the Sacrifice, and the glory of the Resurrection. Indeed it would be an interesting and profitable task to bring together and compare the illustration by different masters of these stupendous truths. Were this done, we think that one result would be surprise at the power generally shown. The themes seem to convey their own inspiration, and to stimulate nobility of thought and grandeur of expression where ordinarily such qualities are not found. Looking at these facts, it is surprising that Cherubini, of whose power there can be no doubt, fails to deeply impress us here. But it is not for want of effort. In the "Crucifixus" he has adopted the plan of giving the words to the chorus for recitation in monotone, while the musical expression is left to the orchestra. We do not hesitate to say that this misses its mark. It is too obviously a device. A person is well dressed, we are often told, whose clothes attract no observation. It may with almost as much truth be said that musical expression is most successful when its method is least remarked. Accepting this as a test, the "Crucifixus" fails. Hearing it, we are not transported to the foot of Calvary and the presence of the Divine Sufferer, but into a music school for the purpose of witnessing an exercise. Having said this, criticism ends and admiration begins—admiration not to be exhausted by fuller utterance than is possible here. Pages might be written upon the beauties that lie thickly scattered about every number, while only close and ardent study could comprehend all the resources from which so much felicity of thought and expression, and such treasures of technical skill are drawn. It is impossible that this Mass should be relegated to the obscurity whence, as regards England, the Bach Choir has drawn it. It must be heard again and again, if only for that which we now recognise as grand and beautiful. But there is another inducement. Fuller knowledge may vindicate the composer in what we now regard as faulty, and establish the reputation of the work as without blemish.

The performance reflected much credit upon all concerned, having regard especially to the sometimes trying nature of the music. Both band and chorus went gallantly and successfully through the long ordeal, while the frequent concerted pieces for solo voices could have had no better exponents than Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. Shakespeare, and Herr Henschel. As for Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, it would be impossible to praise unduly the zeal and skill shown by him in preparing for and conducting a performance certain to be memorable. We should add that the concert was attended by their Royal Highnesses the Princess of Wales and the Duchess of Connaught.

BACH'S "PASSION MUSIC" AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The Special Service at St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of Tuesday before Easter has now become an institution, in the world of religion as well as in that of music, and is looked forward to alike by the devout Churchman and the musical enthusiast.

Very wisely, in our opinion, the Dean and Chapter have, for the last year or two, caused the doors of the Cathedral to remain open without intermission from mid-day; and that this arrangement was fully appreciated was, we think, patent from the fact that many persons did not quit the Cathedral at all after the Afternoon Service. By seven o'clock the building was filled to overflowing, it being estimated that hardly less than ten thousand were present, and that room could scarcely have been found for an additional hundred persons. The Princess of Wales, whose first visit it was, we believe, to this Service, occupied a seat on the south side of the choir, at no great distance from the Bishop of London, who was present in his stall.

The Order of Service—furnished almost entirely by the latter half of the Commination, commencing at the Miserere—employed, if we mistake not, for the first of these gatherings in 1873, has been adhered to ever since; and, in passing, we may remark that it furnishes an uncommonly good model for one of the special Lenten services which now, happily, are so largely on the increase, employing on ordinary occasions say, a hymn, address, and metrical Litany instead of the selection from the Passion Music. Of the Service, speaking from a musical point of view, it is sufficient to say that it was in all respects worthy of, and possibly in some superior to, its predecessors: the Miserere was most striking, the pitch being perfectly sustained from beginning to end, although neither priest nor choir received the slightest instrumental support in any part of the Psalm, the verses of which they sang alternately, nor during the eight-part Gloria Patri. Naturally, however, the great amount of interest centred in the Passion Music, and here (the version employed being, as before, that known as the "St. Matthew") the solo tenor music was divided between Mr. Kenningham and (in the unavoidable and much-regretted absence, through illness, of Mr. Thornton) Mr. Hanson, both of whom acquitted themselves most creditably. The part of the Saviour was, as heretofore, intrusted to Mr. Winn, and the subordinate bass parts to Messrs. De Lacy and Kempton, all of the Cathedral choir; the treble solos were taken by two of the choristers, who have previously filled the same parts; and two innovations, chiefly due, we believe, to the peculiar acoustic properties of the Cathedral, were the singing by the whole of the Cathedral boys of the duet "My Saviour Jesus now is taken," and the solo "See the Saviour's outstretched arm." The orchestral portion of the work was excellent, and with the exception of a slight unsteadiness in one of the difficult double choruses, the singing of the large special choir was most commendable. Much praise is due to Mr. G. C. Martin, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's, as well for his excellent training of the choristers as for his use of the organ, always telling and yet never obtrusive; and to Dr. Stainer for his excellent organisation of the whole of the arrangements and careful supervision (without which entire success can never be obtained) of all detail, not less than for his conducting.

We are unwilling to conclude this notice without giving expression to one thought constantly present to our mind during the evening, and that is the speaking commentary such a Service is on conscientious, straightforward work. Could Sebastian Bach have had any idea of the immense Cathedral of the largest city of the world filled to overflowing year after year by thousands of devout worshippers, listening with rapt attention to his wondrous sermon in music, more than a century and a half after its first production at his own church in Leipzig? Surely not. And yet he worked on, as from the annals of his life we know, his love of art his incentive, his own conscience his reward. Let our living composers take this lesson to heart; and if they must of necessity continue to write royalty songs and similar ephemeral productions, be careful to bestow their best thoughts upon more serious and lofty work, without which they can neither hope to hand down lasting names to posterity, nor to stamp themselves faithful servants and disciples of true art.

OPERA COMIQUE.

The "Pirates of Penzance," produced at this establishment on the 3rd ult., adds one more to the many successes already achieved by Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan. Unlike most operatic works, in which the composer is presumed to be the primary object of consideration, and a few laudatory remarks are therefore usually accorded to the author of the libretto, these "Comic Operas" are always regarded as the well-matured result of an artistic partnership which has been so firmly cemented by the public voice as to insure a ready response to its periodical appeals for support and encouragement. Without attempting to detract from the merits of either of the partners in this firm, there can be little doubt that their union is their strength. Mr. Gilbert, overflowing with a subtle wit and humour peculiarly his own, still rests for popular favour upon the musical colouring which no composer but Mr. Sullivan can so sympathetically convey; and Mr. Sullivan, with a command of the resources of his art, and more especially with a power of making his instruments almost laugh with his text, is ready at his hand to illustrate in sound the refined and clever burlesque of his colleague. Whatever then may be said of the future place of these works in the temple of Fame, there can be no question that there is a public ready and willing to receive them in the present day; and, with every recollection of their predecessors, we unhesitatingly declare "The Pirates of Penzance" to be a higher class of opera than any yet written by these authors. The plot has been already described in this journal, on the production of the work at the small theatre of Paignton. It is true that the idea of apprenticing the hero to a Pirate, instead of a Pilot, is excessively extravagant; but then the Opera itself is an Extravaganza, and we are therefore not justified in questioning probabilities. The story, indeed, is trifling enough; but the excessive cleverness of the dialogue keeps the attention alive throughout. The scene with the pirates in the first act, the appearance of the pretty daughters of Major-General Stanley, who are discovered by the ex-pirate Frederick as they have each taken off a shoe to paddle in the water; the entrance of the stately Major-General himself, and his escape from the clutches of the sea-rovers by the fiction of declaring himself "an orphan"; the second act in the ruined chapel, bought by the Major-General, where, declaring he is a "descendant by purchase," he weeps over the tombs of his "ancestors," as a penance for the falsehood he has told to the pirates; the appearance of the policemen, the clever ruse by which Frederick is made to return to the pirates, and the final battle, in which the policemen are worsted, but remain masters of the situation when the pirates are commanded to surrender in the name of the Queen, are all incidents which, when thus circumstantially related, scarcely perhaps provoke a smile: but Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan know how to use these materials with so consummate a mastery of their art that even the most severely critical must fully acknowledge their power; and the laughter and applause which accompanied the entire performance amply proved that the efforts of both author and composer were fully appreciated. Mr. Sullivan's share of the work has been accomplished in his very best style. With some reminiscences of other composers—especially of Auber—there are occasional snatches of melody superior to anything in his former operas, and the concerted pieces are most cleverly constructed throughout. The chattering chorus of the girls in the first act, whilst the lovers are breathing their vows in the foreground, is one of the best pieces Mr. Sullivan has written; and mention must also be made of the whole of the music of the policemen, the excellent delivery of the solo parts by the Sergeant (Mr. Barrington) being one of the greatest successes of the piece. A melodious, but not very original, love-duet (termed a "Madrigal"), and some of the solos of Frederick likewise claim the warmest praise. It need scarcely be said that the delicate and sympathetic instrumentation accompanying the vocal pieces throughout charmed all musical ears, the effect no doubt being heightened by the skilful conducting of the composer, who has certainly the art of enforcing obedience to his bâton. The Opera was excellently cast, and the perfect manner in which it was given evidenced how careful had been its preparation under the personal superintendence of the authors. Unfortunately Miss Everard was ill, but her part was taken at short notice by Miss Emily Cross, who was received with applause, thoroughly earned by her clever acting and singing in the somewhat thankless part of the nurse, Ruth. Miss Marian Hood as Mabel (the General's daughter), although a novice, evinced both vocally and histrionically the possession of an exceptional talent. In several of her florid solos, and especially in the duet already alluded to, her very clever singing elicited warm and well-deserved plaudits. She has certainly much to learn; but so many vocalists take their "finishing lessons" before an audience that she need scarcely fear receiving kindly encouragement during her progress, which, with her intelligence, will no doubt be rapid. Mr. G. Grossmith has little to do, but he did that little well, his make-up as the Major-General being quite equal to that on former occasions in similar parts. Mr. G. Power has a somewhat weak voice, but he sang the music of Frederick with good effect; Mr. R. Temple, as the Chief of the Pirates, gave us as fine a specimen of true and unexaggerated burlesque singing and acting as can be imagined; his song "I am a Pirate King" being delivered with a mock declamatory energy which fairly convulsed his hearers; and Mr. G. Temple, as his Lieutenant, was thoroughly satisfactory. Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan were called forward both at the end of the first act and at the conclusion of the work; and the delighted auditors, who had encored nearly every piece in the Opera, seemed loth to allow them to retire.

THE programmes of the nine "Richter Concerts" to be given at St. James's Hall, commencing on the 10th inst., although interesting to those who care not for novelty, will somewhat disappoint the many who anticipated a German rendering of modern German works under a Conductor so thoroughly acquainted with their true reading. Especially do we miss selections from the later operas of Wagner, such as were given from his earlier works by the Wagner Society, and also at the composer's own concerts in this country, the performance of which more eloquently expounded the doctrines of the so-called "music of the future" than could all the writings of the founder of the school or of his most earnest disciples. Musically speaking, the presentation of Beethoven's nine Symphonies in regular order must be warmly welcomed; but considering that this has recently been an especial feature at the Crystal Palace Concerts, we should have been pleased had only a selection of these Symphonies been promised by Herr Richter, in order to make room for specimens of the many compositions which have attained so much popularity in Germany, but with which English audiences are but imperfectly acquainted. Apart from these objections, however, there can be no fault to find with the works chosen. In addition to the nine Symphonies of Beethoven, the same composer's Overture to "Leonora" (No. 3) and the Pianoforte Concerto in G (played by Mr. Charles Hallé) will be given. Amongst Wagner's compositions, we are promised the Overture "Die Meistersinger," and "A Faust Overture"; and Schumann's Symphony in D minor (No. 4), Schubert's in C major (No. 9), and the unfinished one in B minor, and Brahms's in D (No. 2) are also included. Mr. Edward Dannreuther will perform Mr. C. Hubert Parry's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp major; and the programmes likewise comprise selections from the works of Cherubini, Weber, Chopin, Liszt, J. S. Bach, Mozart, G. Henschel, and other composers. The orchestra will consist of 100 performers, led by Herr Hermann Franke; Herr Richter will be the Conductor, and the choir rehearsals will be under the conductorship of Herr Th. Frantzen.

MR. OSCAR BERINGER'S Third Annual Concert took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the 21st ult. Seeing that this gentleman is director of what is quaintly termed "The National Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte-Playing," one can hardly be surprised to find that the programme consisted almost entirely of works of the "advanced school." Concerning the most important of these, the Quintet in F major by Rubinstein, it would be wise to refer final judgment to a future time. Merits now unrecognised and beauties still unrevealed may, upon more intimate acquaintance with the music, be disclosed to challenge admiration. Of the four movements, the Scherzo on the first hearing may be said to be by far the most pleasing. Although the entire work was extremely well played by the concert-giver, Messrs. Svendsen, Lazarus, Wendtland, and Wotton, it yet failed to make much impression. Regarding the Sonata dedicated to Robert Schumann by Liszt, and introduced to an English audience on this occasion for the first time by Mr. Oscar Beringer, opinions are not at all likely to be unanimous. An explanatory sketch, supplied by Herr Louis Köhler, claims that it is "a picture of an heroic spirit contending in a world full of strife, defiant and successful against iron-armed adversaries, but at length overcome by softer but not less powerful influences, that in the end purify and ennoble his nature." That these fancies are clearly conveyed or even imperfectly traced cannot for a moment be granted. Doubtless many charming passages are to be found here and there, but at the same time it is certain there is much that sounds crude, harsh, and repulsive to ears attuned to the old masters. Mr. Beringer, in Raff's "Chaconne" for two pianos, was associated with his pupil, Miss Randegger, a young lady who gave undoubted evidence of talent and artistic acquirements. Madame Sterling, scarcely happy in the choice of songs in the first part of the programme, subsequently appeared to greater advantage in "Der Nussbaum" by Schumann.

AN interesting evening to lovers of novelty was provided by Mr. Faulkner Leigh at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, the 14th ult. To produce two cantatas, an orchestral suite, and a bagatelle, also for orchestra, shows no lack of enterprise; and Mr. Leigh must be congratulated upon departing from the custom of making a benefit concert an opportunity for displaying the chevaux de bataille commonly in use. The subject selected by Madame Sainton-Dolby for the Cantata performed on this occasion is "The Story of the Faithful Soul." The libretto, simple and pathetic in utterance, is clothed by the fair composer with music that, without striving for startling effects, enforces in the most natural manner the various emotions excited by the incidents so touchingly related by the poet. The work was most favourably received, and at its close the talented lady, so well known but lately to English audiences, appeared on the platform to receive the applause of her admirers. The Suite by Bizet, the second of the kind from the same pen that has been produced in this country, contains numberless beauties. The Minuet, so fresh and piquant, is one of the most charming conceits ever given us by the author of "Carmen." The band, under Mr. Weist Hill's able conduct, brought clearly out the many musical devices, and, in every way, played the Suite most admirably. "Imogene," a serio-buffa

Cantata, concluded the concert. Containing much smart writing and clever fooling, it succeeded in provoking merriment, but led some to question the expediency of setting music for the concert-room to a class of subject so grotesque. Mr. Faulkner Leigh, besides taking part in the Cantatas, sang "Se tanto in ira agli uomini" (Donizetti) most acceptably, and Madame Sterling and Signor Foli also contributed songs which pleased their hearers. Sir Julius Benedict, M. Sainton, and Messrs. Sidney Naylor and Weist Hill successively conducted.

BY the death of Mr. James Pearman, which occurred on the 3rd ult., Dundee loses one of its oldest and most experienced professional musicians. Mr. Pearman was a native of Winchester, where he began his musical education as a choir-boy in the Cathedral, and was afterwards apprenticed for seven years to Dr. Chard, the organist. His first important appointment was that of organist to St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Montrose. He then became organist to St. Paul's, Dundee, and, among other public duties, discharged that of Conductor to the Dundee Choral Society. He also conducted the long series of People's Concerts, where his efficiency as pianoforte accompanist was most markedly displayed. He had the gift of extemporising also; and, from his intimate acquaintance with theoretical and practical harmony, he was never at a loss for an unwritten organ voluntary or piano accompaniment which any musician could listen to with pleasure. Many of his songs and pianoforte pieces are well known, and he has also left MSS., including a Mass, an extract from which is published in Messrs. Methven, Simpson, and Co.'s "Album Leaves." After serving St. Paul's Church for twenty-four years on an old organ altogether unworthy of his talents, he accepted thirteen years ago the organistship of St. Andrew's Catholic Church. In this office he has died at the age of sixty-three, or nearly so, and in full harness, for he was busy at work up to three days before his death. It is remarkable that very recently, and without any knowledge or even prospect of Mr. Pearman's illness, the idea of getting subscriptions for a testimonial to him was first privately mooted. We are glad to find that this intention will now be carried out for the benefit of his widow and children, and that subscriptions towards the fund will be received either by Duncan Sidey, Esq., Clydesdale Bank, or by H. Simpson, Esq., 122, Nethergate, Dundee.

THE Society of Arts is about to repeat the experiment which it tried last year with considerable success, of holding a practical examination in vocal and instrumental music. The plan will be similar to that previously adopted, with a few modifications suggested by experience. Certificates are awarded in three grades—honours, first-class, and second-class. Candidates will be expected to sing or play a piece already studied, to sing sol-fa or play at sight certain selected passages, and, a keynote being struck and named by the examiner, to name notes sounded at various intervals from that note. This testing of the candidate's ear is one of the important features of the examination, being one of the points in which ordinary musical education in England is conspicuously deficient. For the honours certificate, the candidate will also have to answer a paper, the questions in which will include harmony, simple counterpoint, elementary form, instrumentation, and history of music. The examinations for London will be held at the House of the Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi, London, during the week commencing June 7. Full information can be obtained by intending candidates on application to the Secretary of that Society. It may be added that the examinations are open to all persons whomsoever, there being no restriction in that respect to age, occupation, or rank. A centre for conducting these examinations, in connection with the Society of Arts, has been formed at the Association for the Higher Education of Women at Glasgow, and at the Midland Institute, Birmingham. It is also hoped that the scheme may shortly be taken up in other localities.

A LARGE and appreciative audience assembled in the Norwood Hall on the evening of the 8th ult., to assist in the inauguration of the public performances of the Woodside Choral Society. For some time past the members of this body have been rehearsing under their Conductor, Mr. F. W. Partridge, and the careful labour bestowed on the choral numbers of the programme showed that the time fixed for the first concert was by no means premature. The selection—comprising "Hear my prayer" and part-songs by Mendelssohn; "As pants the hart," Spohr; "Gipsy life," Schumann; and excerpts from "St. Cecilia's Day," Van Bree—was well adapted to test the capabilities of the newly formed choir, and the result proved satisfactory to the listener and encouraging to the vocalists. The bright fresh voices of the sopranos gave especial charm to Schumann's characteristic music. The solos were, for the most part, taken by members of the choir. Mrs. Maycock gave valuable aid by her rendering of the soprano solo in Mendelssohn's psalm; and Mr. George Perren declaimed "Sound an alarm" with the energy and power of voice that have always distinguished his delivery of the great martial air. In addition to the duties of Conductor, Mr. F. W. Partridge added much to the pleasure of the evening by a finished rendering of solos by Rubinstein and Schumann.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society gave a fine performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," on Monday, the 19th ult. The room in connection with St. George's Church was filled to overflowing with an audience that amply testified to the fact that the Society is highly appreciated and deservedly popular in the northern suburb. The choruses, trying even to larger and longer-established bodies, were attacked with the firmness begotten of constant drilling, and the many difficulties therein were fairly overcome, the two masterpieces, "Rise up, arise" and "How great is the depth," being given with verve and accuracy. The soloists, with one exception—Mr. Lewis Thomas, who sang the widely differing airs "Consume them all," and "Lord have mercy," with becoming feeling and power of voice—were members of the Society. Each of the vocalists in the several recitatives and airs sang creditably; and it is but fair to add that Mrs. Dietz and Miss Philps in the most important numbers were excellent, the former lady giving fervency to the air "Jerusalem," and the latter suitable pathos to "The Lord is mindful." Mr. Grylls rendered most valuable aid throughout the work, and Mr. W. Henry Thomas, to whom all praise is due for the highly efficient state of the Society, conducted with skill and energy.

THE last Subscription Concert of the season of the Brixton Choral Society drew together, on the 22nd ult., a large audience. Spohr's "Calvary" was the work chosen, and, considering the awkward intervals and chromatic passages with which it abounds, a very creditable result was achieved. Madame Alice Barth, who took the part of Mary in the absence of Madame Emma Beasley through indisposition, sang in a careful and painstaking manner, but seemed occasionally somewhat overweighted, particularly in the more trying airs. Mr. Dudley Thomas gave the music apportioned to the character of the Apostle St. John efficiently, and the remaining solo parts were all more or less well sustained. It is pleasant to be able to speak in terms of praise of the chorus, who, in the finely written number "King of Israel, all hail!" sang with power and effect. That the band of the Society should find much of Spohr's music beyond their means is scarcely to be wondered at, but thanks to the able assistance of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, who presided at the organ, the accompaniments afforded the needful support to the choir. Mr. Lemare's conducting showed that a complete understanding existed between himself and the executants.

AN excellent Concert was given on Thursday, the 15th ult., at the Angell Town Institute, Brixton, in aid of the St. Michael's Church (Stockwell) Restoration Fund, under the conductorship of Mr. John Harrison and Signor Mazzoni. Mrs. Bucknall-Eyre, A.R.A.M., was highly successful in the rendering of Raff's "Rigaudon" (encored), Chopin's "Nocturne" in E flat, and Scharwenka's "Staccato Study." Miss Marian Mackenzie gave two of her favourite and most successful songs, "The storm" (Hullah) and "The willow song" (Sullivan), and Miss Madeline Hardy, R.A.M., received a well-deserved encore for Maude Valerie White's charming song "Loving and true"; and in the duet, "Giorno d' orrore" (in which she was joined by Miss Ada Knight), the voices were remarkably well blended. The other artists who appeared were Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Mary Chatterton (harp), Mr. Alfred Kenningham, Mr. Ben Davies, Signor Vergara, and Mr. Ernest Wise. The thanks of the committee are due to Miss Madeline Hardy, to whose talents and interest in the church may be attributed the success of the concert, and a result of about £45 net to be handed over to the Treasurer of the Church Restoration Fund.

THE competition for the Lady Goldsmid Scholarship for lady pianists took place at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday, the 21st ult. The examiners were Messrs. Cox, Eyers, Fitton, Jewson, Lunn, Walter Macfarren, O'Leary, Harold Thomas, Wingham, Westlake, Dr. Steggall, and the Principal (Professor Macfarren), chairman. There were seventeen candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Dinah Shapley.—The competition for the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship for female vocalists took place on Wednesday and Thursday, the 21st and 22nd ult. The examiners were Messrs. Cox, Fiori, Garcia, Walter Macfarren, and the Principal (Professor Macfarren), chairman. There were forty-nine candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Charlotte Thudichum.—The competition for the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship for male candidates in any branch of music took place on Thursday, the 22nd ult. The examiners were Messrs. Cox, Eyers, Walter Macfarren, Brinley Richards, Sainton, Harold Thomas, Westlake, Wingham, and the Principal. There were eight candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Charles S. Macpherson.

MR. GEORGE GEAR'S Annual Concert took place at St. George's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, the 20th ult., and was honoured by a distinguished audience. The Introduction and Polonaise in C by Chopin, for pianoforte and violoncello, which began the programme, are too well known to professors and amateurs to need special mention. It is sufficient to say that the characteristic music received justice from its interpreters, Messrs. Gear and Albert. The concert-giver selected for the first part Rubinstein's Romance in E flat, and Weber's "Il moto continuo," and by his facile rendering of the latter fairly asserted his position as a well-trained pianist. In the second part he filled the double rôle of composer and executant with success. The Rigaudon entitled "Le Plaisir" exhibits a pleasant fancy and fluent expression. Madame Patey sang in her own incomparable manner Blumenthal's "Arise, and follow me," and her powerful aid was likewise given to Mr. Gear's new song, "Sweet visions," with a success which secured an enthusiastic encore. Miss Penna and Mr. Bernard Lane contributed to the vocal importance of the concert. Messrs. Parker and Albert were Conductors.

THE second annual Concert of the St. Mark's Choral Society, given under the superintendence of Mr. George Calkin, took place in the Vestry Hall, Haverstock Hill, on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., and was numerously attended. The programme was divided into two parts, the first consisting of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral, "The May Queen," and the second of vocal and instrumental selections. The overture was played by Mr. J. B. Calkin (piano) and Mr. King Hall (harmonium), and each of the players being a thorough master of his instrument, it proved very effective. The first chorus, "Awake, awake," was given by the choir in a manner which showed that much care had been spent upon the rehearsals by both singers and Conductor. Miss Jessie Royd was an efficient May Queen, and Miss Mary Willis an excellent Queen. Mr. George Calkin took the part of the Lover, and Mr. J. W. A. Calkin represented Robin Hood. Mr. George Calkin conducted. The second part was opened by Mr. and Mrs. Val. Nicholson with an admirably played violin and piano duet, which was cordially received.

AT the final meeting of the Fourth Season of the Lewisham Orchestral Society, on Saturday, the 10th ult., Mr. Warwick Jordan was presented by the members with a testimonial, consisting of a very handsome gold chain and locket, together with the following inscription engrossed on parchment: "To C. Warwick Jordan, Esq., Mus. Bac., Oxon., Conductor of the Lewisham Orchestral Society. We, the undersigned members of the Lewisham Orchestral Society, desire to tender you our thanks for the able and energetic manner in which you have conducted our Society for the past four seasons, and to express how highly we appreciate your talent as a musician, and your ability as a conductor. We ask your acceptance of the accompanying gold chain and locket which we hope you will wear in affectionate remembrance of those who have been associated with you for so many years. That your life may long be spared to your family, to your friends, and to this Society is the sincere wish of us all."

MADAME JENNY VIARD-LOUIS'S third Matinée at the Steinway Hall, on the afternoon of the 26th ult., was scarcely so well attended as her many claims on public attention would warrant. Amateurs might well recollect the fine Orchestral Concerts lately given by this enterprising lady, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill, at St. James's Hall. In addition to Beethoven's Sonata for the Pianoforte (Op. 31, No. 2), Madame Viard-Louis played, in association with MM. Hollander and Lasserre, in a Trio by Angelina, a composition that has merits besides the charm of novelty. Chopin's Sonata (Op. 65), for pianoforte and violoncello, afforded an opportunity for exhibiting the talents of the accomplished lady, and the fine phrasing of M. Lasserre. The vocalists were Madame Christiani, Miss Mathilde Lennon, M. Elliott Langworth, and Signor Fabrini. Mr. Carter conducted.

WE are glad to find that music will shortly be represented in the Southern Hemisphere by a journal devoted especially to its interests. The title of this publication will be The Colonial Musical Monthly, and its size royal quarto, sixteen pages. In addition to criticisms upon local musical and dramatic doings, and on Home and Colonial productions, full information will be given upon the musical events of the day in all parts of the globe; and a special feature will be the publication in each number of songs and pianoforte music. The journal will be published by Messrs. Nicholson and Ascherberg, Melbourne; and as agents will be established in all the cities and principal towns of Australia and New Zealand, there can be little doubt that it will command an extensive sale. The first number is announced for June 1 next.

THE Annual Service in connection with the Anniversary Festival of Sion College, consisting of full choral evensong, took place at the Church of St. Alphege, London Wall, E.C., on Tuesday, the 20th ult. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Garrett in D, and for the anthem, the solo "My hope is in the everlasting," followed by the chorus "Awake, thou that sleepest," from Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," was employed. The singing of the choir, which consisted solely of some sixteen members of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, was almost perfect, and was heard to great advantage in the square and somewhat small church. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. W. H. Milman, and Mr. C. F. South, organist of St. Augustine and St. Faith, City, officiated at the organ.

ON Monday evening, the 5th ult., a Concert was given before a very numerous audience at Brixton Independent Church. The programme consisted of a selection from "The Messiah," Mendelssohn's Motett "Hear my Prayer," and other sacred compositions. The choral music was rendered with commendable precision by the advanced class of the body of Tonic Sol-fa singers known as the "South London Choral Association." The soloists, each of whom deserved praise, were Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. Alfred Moore. Mr. Leonard C. Venables acted as Conductor, and the accompaniments were sustained by a small orchestra of strings, assisted by Mr. Alfred Rhodes, R.A.M., at the organ. The proceeds were applied to the liquidation of the debt upon the church.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society's Third Evening Concert took place on Monday the 5th ult., at the Highbury Athenæum, Highbury New Park. The more important items in the programme were Haydn's "Spring" (from the "Seasons"), Mendelssohn's Serenade for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Cherubini's Overture "Der Wasserträger," and Schubert's Overture "Im Italienischen Style," Op. 170. The novelty of the evening was a Chorus, with orchestral accompaniment, entitled "A wet sheet and a flowing sea," composed for the Society by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, which created a highly favourable impression.

All the solo vocalists did full justice to the music with which they were intrusted, and were warmly applauded. Dr. J. F. Bridge conducted.

MR. MAPLESON was expected at Queenstown on his return from America last Monday, and arrangements for the delayed opening of Her Majesty's Theatre (now announced for the 15th inst.) were then to be energetically pushed forward. The delay has, of course, arisen from the important matters at issue between the director and the proprietors of the New York Academy of Music, in view of future seasons; and the London campaign must be necessarily short, if not uneventful. It is believed that Mr. Mapleson contemplates the production of Boito's "Mefistofele"; and we know, as a matter of fact, that his readiness to do so would, in some measure, determine the attitude of Madame Christine Nilsson, who has a special desire to play the part. The principal artists will be mainly those of previous seasons, but some extra and interesting engagements are said to have been made, and we may look for the appearance of one or two new American singers. But little can be stated with certainty, Mr. Mapleson having a habit of doing things at the last moment, and crowding much achievement into a little space.

A VERY successful Concert was given at the Albion Hall, London Wall, on Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., by the London Excelsior Senior Band of Hope and Choral Society. The programme consisted of Root and Bradbury's Cantata "Daniel," the chorus, numbering nearly 100, being assisted with a small, but efficient band. The principal vocalists were Misses E. Clifford, E. and H. Pye, and S. Lawrence, Messrs. Foot, Games, Duncan, G. and R. Montford, Lightfoot, and Merrit. Mr. Williams conducted, and Mr. Branch very ably acted as leader of the band. Miss A. Montford presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Marsh, Organist of St. Chad's, Haggerstone, at the harmonium. The hall was filled with an attentive and appreciative audience.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN, who has recently returned from her successful tour in Germany, announces a Concert at St. James's Hall on the 13th inst., assisted by the following artists: vocalists, Mdlle. Fides Keller and Mr. Santley; violin, Herr Straus; viola, M. Zerbini; and violoncello, M. Lasserre. The refined and intellectual performance of Miss Zimmermann always ensures a thoroughly artistic gathering at her Recitals; and as her programme on this occasion will include Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and violin, Saint-Saëns's Quartet (Op. 41) for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello; and Schumann's "Faschingsschwank" (Op. 26), for pianoforte solo, the selection offers a powerful attraction to the lovers of modern chamber-music.

THE Summer Season of Tuesday Evening Meetings at the College of Organists commenced on the 6th ult., and two of the meetings have already taken place. For the present month two papers are promised, to be read on alternate Tuesdays (the 4th and 18th), at eight o'clock. That on Tuesday next, the 4th instant, will be by the Secretary, Mr. E. H. Turpin, and be entitled "Tone Colour." In connection with the College, three lectures will be delivered by Herr E. Behnke at the Neumeyer Hall, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, on Wednesdays the 12th, 19th, and 26th, at four o'clock, on the "Physiology of the Human Voice," to which non-members of the College will be admitted on payment of two shillings, or five shillings for the course.

THE last Concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society in Exeter Hall occurs too late for notice in our present number; but we may mention that the Oratorio selected for the occasion, "Israel in Egypt," the popularity of which is mainly owing to the exertions of this Society, is assuredly the most appropriate that could possibly be chosen. Whatever may be the future of this Institution, there can be no question that the memory of its excellent renderings of some of the greatest works in sacred art will long cling around the building to which it now bids farewell; and the interest of its final performance in the Hall will, therefore, doubtless attract not only an artistic, but a thoroughly sympathetic, audience.

GERMANY is reading us a lesson which it is hoped we shall take to heart; for in spite of the apathy with which English lyrical composers are treated in their own country, a new Opera has been accepted, and will be produced at the Royal Opera in Hanover, composed by Mr. Charles Villiers Stanford, Organist of Trinity College, Cambridge. The libretto is founded upon the subject of "The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" (from Moore's "Lalla Rookh"), and, written in English by Mr. Barclay Squire, has been translated into German by Herr Frank. From the antecedents of the composer we may confidently predict a decisive success.

JOSEF RUMMEL, well known as a composer and skilful arranger for the pianoforte, died at his residence, St. Augustine's Road, Camden Square, on March 25. A native of Wiesbaden in Germany, where he was instructor to the princesses of the grand ducal house, he afterwards resided in Paris, and, being obliged in 1870 to leave the French capital, he came to this country and became a naturalised Englishman. He was highly successful in teaching and composing for his instrument; and as an earnest and unassuming artist will be long remembered both by his brother professors and a large circle of private friends.

A SPECIAL Service will take place on the afternoon of Holy Thursday, the 6th inst., in Westminster Abbey, similar to those held there on Ascension Day for the past two years. The Anthem will consist of portions of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the selections from the Oratorio being rather more comprehensive than heretofore; and for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis we understand it is intended to use a setting by Mr. J. C. Bridge, of Chester, composed for a Festival held in Chester Cathedral last year. A full orchestra will, as on both the previous occasions, be employed.

WE regret to learn that the Festival in aid of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army, which has been held at this season at St. Paul's Cathedral for two years past, will not take place this year. The musical feature of the Service was the employment of four of the best of our military bands as well as the organ, an ensemble being thus produced which, heightened in effect no doubt by the building, was indescribably impressive and grand. We hope some other occasion may be found for affording the bands an opportunity of combining to take part in the performance of Divine Service in the same place.

THE second Concert of the season of the North London Philharmonic Society took place on Monday, the 5th ult., at the Athenæum, Camden Road. Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was the work selected for performance, with Miss Millie Turner, Miss Amy Dicksee, Mr. J. F. Probert, and Mr. J. A. Latta as soloists. The choir, assisted by a small orchestra, was under the leadership of Mr. J. L. Kitcat. The rendering of the Cantata was highly effective, and fully appreciated by a large audience. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart was the Conductor.

THE Annual Festival of the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy takes place on Wednesday, the 12th inst. The Special Service, which will be held at St. Paul's Cathedral, will be orchestral, and similar in other respects to its recent predecessors. The chief items of musical interest are the Anthem, for which Spohr's 84th Psalm, "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair," has been selected, and a new setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, written specially for the occasion by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford.

A JOURNAL, under the title of Music, and termed "A Weekly Newspaper for Musicians and Amateurs," commenced its career on the 3rd ult. In addition to some interesting articles on the art to which it is devoted, a Minuet from the Posthumous Quartet in E flat of Mendelssohn, transcribed for the pianoforte by L. Samson, is included in the first number. We need scarcely say that, as a fellow-worker in our own ranks, we cordially wish the new comer every success.

THE second Concert of the Second Series of Chamber Concerts in connection with Herr Aug. Zimmermann's School of Music, Brixton, took place at the Angell Town

It is not always May.

Institution on the 1st ult. The programme comprised String Trio in E flat (Beethoven), Sonata for piano and violoncello (Rubinstein), and Piano Quartet (Louis Lee); the executants being Messrs. Ersfeld, Zimmermann, Ould, and Maurice Lee. Songs by Mozart, Schumann, &c., were contributed by Frl. Louise von Hennig.

THE Hornet Cricket Club gave its first Evening Concert on the 22nd ult., at St. Thomas's Hall, Hackney, which was largely attended. The soloists were Misses Lemmon and Taylor, and Messrs. Heney, Crome, Sutton Smith, C. E. Tutill, Vose, Thompson, and E. Tutill. The programme was an excellent one, and the artists acquitted themselves in a highly creditable manner. Miss Cressy gave two pianoforte solos in an artistic style, and Mr. W. Crome was an able accompanist.

MISS ALICE SALZMANN'S Evening Concert took place at All Saints' Institute, Priory Grove, Clapham, on the 24th ult. The artists were Miss Hélène Greiffenhagen and Mr. Stedman (vocalists), Mr. H. Morley (violin), Mr. H. T. Trust (violoncello), and Miss Alice Salzmann (piano). The programme included Hummel's Trio in G major, Pauer's "La Cascade," two pieces by Rubinstein for piano and violoncello, Gade's Novelleten, Op. 29, for piano, violin, and violoncello, &c.

AT the usual Wednesday Evening Service at St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, on the 14th ult., the greater portion of "The Messiah" was sung by a choir of sixty voices, including the Westminster Abbey Boys, Mr. Stedman's Choir-Boys, and members of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. Madame Marion Stringer, Master Ivimey, Mr. Noble, Mr. Newth, and Mr. Orme were the soloists, and Dr. Bridge presided at the organ.

WE are informed that Herr Max Bruch has accepted the appointment of Conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, vacant by the resignation of Sir Julius Benedict. It is arranged that he will reside in Liverpool during the season, from September till April, and conduct all the rehearsals, choral and instrumental, as well as the Concerts of the Society.

THE Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association, in which a choir of 1,000 voices as well as a full band will take part, will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 13th inst. Applications for tickets, accompanied by stamped directed envelope, should be addressed to the newly appointed honorary secretary, Mr. H. C. Richards, 22, Charterhouse Square, E.C.

UNDER the direction of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, the violin class in connection with the Stockwell Educational Institute gave a Concert on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult. Mr. Gatehouse merits praise for his carefully executed violin soli, which were received with manifestations of warm approval. The vocalists were Miss Ellen Marchant, Miss Margaret Hoare, Mr. Joseph Hay, and Mr. Phillips.

A VERY successful performance of "St. Paul" was given on the 21st ult. at the Masonic Hall, Camberwell, by the members of the South Lambeth Musical Society, assisted by Miss Luke, Miss Edith Maas, Mr. H. Parkin, and Mr. Arthur Sarjeant. The band was very complete and steady throughout, and the whole performance was good. Mr. J. Sarjeant conducted.

A CONCERT was given at the Bermondsey Working Men's Institute on the 20th ult. under the direction of Mr. Stedman. The vocalists were Miss Florence Montgomery and Miss Hebe Barlow (who replaced Miss Muriel Wood and Miss Grieffenhagen), Miss Millie Turner, Miss Damian, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Mr. Thomas Pettit was pianist and accompanist.

MR. CHARLES J. FROST, Mus. Bac., F.C.O., gave an Organ Recital at Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, on the 10th ult. The programme, which was excellently selected, was (with one exception) devoted to the productions of Englishmen—an example worthy of imitation. Miss L'Estrange was the vocalist.

MR. JAMES LOARING, of Bradford, has been elected Organist and Director of the Choir to the Church of St. Sepulchre's, Holborn Viaduct, in succession to the late Mr. G. Cooper, Organist of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal and St. Sepulchre's.

TWO performances of Berlioz's "Faust" will be given by Mr. Charles Hallé, in St. James's Hall, on the 21st and 22nd inst. The solos will be sung by Miss Mary Davies (Margaret), Mr. E. Lloyd (Faust), Mr. Hilton (Brander), and Herr Henschel (Mephistopheles). The band and chorus will consist of 300 performers.

THE Cambridge University Musical Society has lately succeeded in securing the services of a resident violinist, Herr Richard Gompertz, a former pupil of Joachim. Herr Gompertz has already appeared at several of the Society's Chamber Concerts, and his powers are spoken of in high terms by the local critics.

A NEW Oratorio by Dr. Dearle, entitled "Israel in the Wilderness," is announced for performance, for the first time, at the Royal Albert Hall, on the 6th inst., by Mr. William Carter's Choir.

HAYDN'S Third (Imperial) Mass has been sung at the High Celebration of the Holy Communion, both on Easter Day and Low Sunday, at the Church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, City.

THE Morning Post states that Her Majesty has conferred upon Mr. Best, the Organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, a pension of £100 a year from Her Majesty's Civil List, in recognition of his services to music.

DR. HORTON ALLISON was unanimously elected a Member of the Royal Academy of Music at the meeting of the Committee which took place on the 7th ult.

REVIEWS.

Herne. Opera in Three Acts. Libretto written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by John Old. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MANY years ago a small section of dramatists, despairing of getting their works placed before the public at any metropolitan theatre, banded themselves together, under the title of the "Syncretic Society," into a publishing Association, hoping to appeal to an audience of readers who would doubtless urge their claims upon the managers of theatrical establishments with such force that they could hardly be resisted. That these pieces were mostly "unactable," as well as "unacted," was often said by the critics of the time; but with what truth may be best judged by those few who have possessed themselves of some of the publications of this now defunct Society, and hoarded them up in some beloved corner of their dramatic library. The issue of the three-act Opera before us, with a pianoforte reduction of the full score, seems to indicate that we have a need of some such Society for composers. True it is Mr. Carl Rosa has shown us that the taste for English Opera has only been slumbering in this country; but those works of purely British growth which he has hitherto produced can scarcely be received as the best specimens to be procured; and this is probably the reason why "Herne" is submitted to public judgment through a music-publisher instead of an operatic lessee. We need scarcely say that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to review an Opera, where—even if not constructed on true Wagnerian principles—so much must depend upon stage accessories; and we can therefore only speak generally of the character of the music. The instrumental introduction, or "Prologomena," as it is termed, has not the form of an Overture, and is too long for a mere string of themes to be found in the Opera; but it is by no means deficient in interest, and well prepares the mind for what is to follow. If we except the Finale to the Opera, the best music is in the first Act. Herne's solo, "The Lord of the Forest am I," in E minor and major, if not quite in consonance with our traditional notions of the characteristics of the mysterious huntsman, is a good song, with some effective figures in the accompaniment; two Duets, a Quintet, and the Finale to the first Act show that the composer has not only much feeling for melody, but very decided dramatic power, the last-named piece especially having many excellent points; and with the addition of the orchestral parts (as far as can be judged by the accompaniment, with occasional indications of the score) a good stage performance of this Act would be highly successful.

In the second Act an important Scene and Duet may be mentioned as the best dramatic piece; but the Finale contains some vigorous writing, the chorus being most effectively combined with the solo voices. The last Act is brief; but, as we have already said, the Finale stands forth prominently, being well written throughout, both for the voices and instruments. We cannot say that the words of the libretto are of a character to call up much inspiration in a composer:—

Yes! grape-juice to elate us;
Pleasures await us

may be cited as an average specimen of the verses given to the chorus; and is a line called up by the supernatural appearance of Herne, the huntsman. Such versification is scarcely likely to elevate the tone of English Opera, the musical portion of which is certain to rise or fall with the character of the libretto. The composer has evidenced the possession of so much dramatic feeling in the setting of this Opera that we much regret the mixture of styles—observable even in portions of the same piece. We could pass over an especial leaning towards any particular school; but the ultra Italian will not amalgamate with the modern German; and we cannot but think that had Mr. Old thought more of what he ought to do with the words, and less of what other people would have done with them, the result would have been infinitely more satisfactory. With all its defects, however, we cordially welcome this additional proof of the talent existing around us, since it will help to dispel the doubt as to material being ready at hand should any enterprising lessee devote himself to the performance of original English Operas.

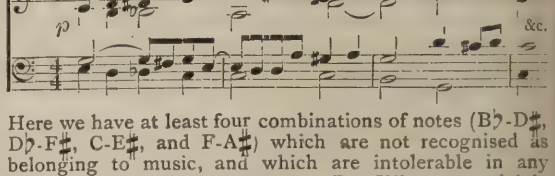
The Grammar of Music. By Henry Hiles, Mus. Doc., Oxon. Book I. Consonances and Dissonances. [Forsyth Brothers.]

This elaborate work shows in some respects a decided advance on many of the musical treatises in ordinary use. The number of chords and progressions illustrated is very large, and in explaining them an attempt is evidently made to find a more secure theoretical basis than has often been the case. Dr. Hiles begins by stating that scales and chords are tuned by consonant intervals, and that the smoothness of consonance is due to the absence of beats. These are commonplaces of science, but it is new to find them in a grammar of music. Having thus got the practical facts on which harmony is founded, it would seem unnecessary for Dr. Hiles to go into the physical theory of beats; but since he has done so, it is unfortunate that his teaching should be opposed to that which is now everywhere accepted as true. Beats, he says, are "caused by the complexity of the ratios of the two sets of vibrations," and harmony "has no sort of connection with, or reliance upon, the phenomena of harmonics." The arguments Dr. Hiles brings forward in support of his position refute many current fallacies, but in no way apply to the theory of consonance demonstrated by Helmholtz. As this theory has often been very imperfectly treated, it may be well to refer to the Proceedings of the Musical Association, 1874-5, pp. 122-5, as containing a satisfactory explanation. Those who wish for practical proof of what is there advanced will find it in Dr. Preyer's pamphlet published last year. If musicians will be scientific, it is surely better for them to learn from the latest and most trustworthy authorities, than to fasten on notions which are nearly twenty years out of date.

Like most theorists, Dr. Hiles accepts the idea that every chord is derived from a root. But he does not use this word to mean the note whose harmonics would give the notes of the chord, nor to mean the lowest note of the chord when arranged in a series of thirds. He defines the root as the sound "upon which the chord rests most comfortably and consonantly." Of course this rule cannot apply to dissonant chords; and in the second section of the work, which treats of dissonances, the root is defined anew as the note from whose chromatic scale the chord is derived. This hardly agrees with the statement at the beginning, that chords are derived from consonant intervals, not from scales. Moreover, according to the first definition, a chord could have only one root; while, according to the second, it might have several, for the same chord might be found in several different keys. In fact, Dr. Hiles derives A♭-C-E♭-F♯ either from G, C, or E♭. What is to be gained from this view does not appear; for it cannot be pretended that the ear feels the chord to be derived from any of these notes. Even as regards the scientific explanation of chords, the idea of a Root does not seem to be of any use.

A large number of chords and progressions which are usually considered to change the key, Dr. Hiles treats as chromatic. We do not object to this, for the limits of the key hardly admit of exact definition. Some of these chromatic chords look new and strange, owing to the peculiar way in which they are written; but when translated into the common notation they are familiar enough. That Dr. Hiles has views of his own respecting notation the following example from his book will show (p. 77):—



Here we have at least four combinations of notes (B♭-D♯, D♭-F♯, C-E♯, and F-A♯) which are not recognised as belonging to music, and which are intolerable in any tuning but equal temperament. Dr. Hiles says plainly that this "notation of chromatic dissonant sounds does not show the actual pitch of the sounds; but, rather, their progressive tendencies towards notes of different names—as F♯ to G; G♭ to F." Elsewhere he cautions the student against an incorrect notation of chromatic consonant sounds (p. 31); but the student will fail to understand why F♯ and G♭ should cease to be signs of pitch when applied to dissonances.

The first book raises so many interesting questions that we must defer the consideration of the second, which treats of Counterpoint and Form, till some future time.

The National Music of the World. By the late Henry Fothergill Chorley. Edited by Henry G. Hewlett. [Sampson Low and Co.]

Mr. Hewlett (who has already compiled the Autobiography, Memoir, and Letters of the late Mr. Chorley) says in his preface to the work before us: "In offering these essays to the world I am giving effect to the wish of my deceased friend," so that it will be seen that, so far from any violence being done to his memory, there can be little question that, had he lived, these Essays would have been published precisely as they now appear. But the art-criticism of Mr. Chorley was written at a time when, in this country at least, he had few rivals; and although, therefore, we have now every respect for the boldness with which he advanced his opinions, there are not many who have the same respect for the opinions themselves. "If the public," says Mr. Hewlett, "has declared itself in favour of certain canons of art which he rejected, and one or two composers with whom he had imperfect sympathy, it has adhered in the main to the principles which he advocated, and endorsed the verdicts which he pronounced." We have a very perfect recollection of Mr. Chorley's writings; and without advancing our own opinions upon the matter, we can positively affirm that in very rare instances has the public "endorsed the verdicts which he pronounced." A generation has grown up since his time whose judgment is unfettered by old-world traditions; and not only, therefore, have modern competent judges exalted many of the composers he depreciated, but they have depreciated many of those he exalted. Of course the subject of the Essays in the volume before us would scarcely draw forth any decided opinions upon the relative genius of creative artists; but here and there we light upon an assertion which, even at this short distance from the day in which it was written, seems somewhat antiquated. For example, speaking of Rossini, he says: "I hold that, since Handel, there has been no musician deserving the epithet so completely as the composer of 'Il Barbiere,' 'La Donna del Lago,' the third act of 'Otello,' the tomb-scene of 'Semiramide,' the greater portion of 'Moïse,' and 'Guillaume Tell.'" Leaving out of the question the last-named Opera (in which the composer deserted the style by which he had won his fame), will the public ratify this sweeping criticism? Passing, however, from a review upon Mr. Chorley (which, by the way, Mr. Hewlett somewhat courts in his preface) to a review upon his book, we are disposed to welcome with pleasure these pleasant talks upon National Music. Throughout the Essays there is an earnestness which was one of the leading characteristics of the author, and one which, even when we differ from him, we cannot but admire. In "Music from the East" we have some very interesting information respecting the tunes which come to us from this quarter of the world; and amongst many others, the air "Malbrouk"—respecting the parentage of which there has been much controversy—is given, the Eastern version certainly being widely different from that coupled with French words, and which attained such popularity some years ago. "Music from the South" contains some well-merited tributes to the genius of the very many composers of this musical portion of the globe, M. Gounod—who was at the time the author wrote rapidly making his fame in this country—being especially praised. The Russian melodies are largely dilated upon in "Music from the North," and also the Polish music, than which perhaps nothing more thoroughly National can be found. Much is said in the last chapter, "Music from the West," about Welsh airs, and the national instrument, the harp, which, as the author truly observes, has been "too much undervalued in our day." Thanks to the patriotic exertions of some of our prominent Welsh artists, and also to the munificent gifts of really genuine instruments by enthusiastic residents of the Principality, we are beginning to hear much more of the "Welsh harp," and we shall be glad to find that their praiseworthy efforts have not only rescued the instrument from comparative oblivion, but have had the effect of placing it in a foremost position, at least at all Welsh musical festivals. The four Essays contained in the volume under notice are based upon lectures delivered by the author at the Royal Institution in 1862, and subsequently at Manchester and Birmingham; and although more exhaustive works have appeared on the subject since that time, we can promise those who possess themselves of Mr. Chorley's "National Music of the World" that they will derive both pleasure and profit from a perusal of its pages.

The History of Music from the Christian Era to the Present Time. By Dr. F. L. Ritter. [W. Reeves.]

THE publication of a second edition of this work affords a satisfactory proof that the book has supplied to some extent an acknowledged want. Of course a volume of 465 pages cannot pretend to compete in completeness with the larger works of Hawkins and Burney, and indeed this history is chiefly valuable from the fact that it continues the thread of musical story down to our own day. It is pleasantly readable, and apparently free from undue or overstrained partisanship, notwithstanding the fact that considerable space is devoted to what is commonly called the "Music of the Future." The author has added a considerable amount of matter to that contained in the first edition, and has made many revisions; the introduction is worthy of great praise both for matter and manner, albeit the author's notions of Hebrew temple-music seem to be somewhat flippant and questionable. The history of Neumæ is discussed at length, and the author arrives at conclusions respecting their origin which are quite opposed to the views elaborately and frequently stated by Fétis, as we think with more correctness and probability. A table of Neumæ with translations into modern notation is given, but should any one attempt to elucidate an old MS. by its aid he will find, as others have before, that he has ventured into an unknown sea whose depths up to the present time have not been fathomed. The author has touched upon the history of musical art and progress in England with a scant and sparing hand, and has failed to do justice to this important branch of his subject; but further judgment on this head must be deferred until after the publication of his promised treatise on "English Musical Culture." As it is probable that a third edition of the work under notice will be required, we advise the addition of copious references to authorities, both as regards the text and the musical examples. In a book especially designed for the use of students, like this, it is indispensable that every facility should be afforded for verifying statements, and we should be glad to know, for instance, from whence Dr. Ritter obtains the Psalm said to be by Claude Goudimel: we neither recognise the key nor the harmony as Goudimel's.

Examples should always be given literatim, or they are comparatively valueless; for this reason we strongly object to the harmony put to "Adam de la Halle's Song" on page 69; also to the pianoforte accompaniments to the excerpts from Peri, Monteverde, and Lully. They should appear simply with the figured basses of the composers.

Simple Studies for the Pianoforte: Introductory Exercises. Composed by William H. Hunt. [J. F. Pettit.]

SIX of the twelve pieces contained in this now complete work have been noticed in these columns as they were published; and the remainder, recently issued, fully merit the warm commendation bestowed upon the former ones. Indeed it is seldom that we have seen strictly educational little lessons so pleasing as well as instructive; and we earnestly recommend them to the attention of those teachers who desire that their pupils shall be trained upon music which gradually shadows forth the elaborate compositions of the great masters. The Scherzo is a good specimen of a simple, playful movement; the Bourrée in G major, and Tarantelle in G minor, have all the characteristics of these dances; the Minuet and Trio, although perhaps not quite equal in interest to those already mentioned, are well-considered trifles; the March in D is sufficiently martial to justify its title; and the Sonatina, containing three short movements, is melodious, and includes some imitative passages for the left hand. An excellent feature in this work is the plan of turning a line upwards to indicate a partial break in the sense, and downwards to show the end of the phrase; very clear and easy rules being also given for counting. We cannot, however, agree with the system (which we see so frequently adopted) of counting and only when the notes forming the partitions of the bar are divided. For example, in No. 8, the student is told to count "1, 2 & 3, 4 &" to a crotchet followed by two quavers, twice over, in a bar of Simple Quadruple Time. Now we contend that where the "2 &" is to be counted is the very place where the "&" is unnecessary, and that the 1, where it is not to be counted, is the very place where it is necessary. The second division of the bar will take care of itself; but having said "1," when is the young pupil to say "2"? The same objection applies to the counting of No. 9, in 6-8 time, where the player is directed to say to two bars noted thus:—

The word "triplet," as we believe, only being required where it is not to be said, according to the author. In a work generally so well considered we should be glad to see these objections removed; but should Mr. Hunt not concur in the truth of our remarks, we can only say that he will have many teachers to support him.

The Year. A Cantata. The words selected from various Poets. The music composed by William Jackson (Masham). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

CONSIDERING that this work, originally produced at the Bradford Musical Festival of 1859, has long ago taken its place in public favour, it is unnecessary minutely to criticise its merits. As until the appearance of this edition, however, it was only procurable in folio size, it can scarcely have attained that extensive popularity which, now that it appears in the welcome octavo form, may be confidently relied upon. Unlike most of our modern Cantatas, the words are collected from numerous sources; yet all the little poems are not only admirably suited for the composer's design of musically depicting the varied seasons of the year, but they are chosen exclusively from the writings of those whose charming verses have already won their way to enduring fame. The fresh and tuneful character of the music, and the skilful but undemonstrative treatment of the voice parts throughout the choral portions of the Cantata, will warmly recommend the composition to the notice of private drawing-room choirs, as well as to those Choral Societies which appeal to public criticism upon their efforts; for there is always a difficulty in obtaining vocal works which, whilst sufficiently pleasing for a general audience, are not too trivial to be placed before the educated musician. The pianoforte part in this edition is excellently arranged, with full indications of the salient points of the score; and it may be added that, although conveying a good idea of the orchestration, the accompaniments are thoroughly within the reach of any moderate pianist.

Improvisation, Barcarole, Serenade, pour le Piano. Par Oliver A. King. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SOME of this young composer's works have already been favourably noticed in "THE MUSICAL TIMES"; and here are three novelties from his pen which will assuredly add to his reputation. No. 1 has all the air of an Improvisation, but, although brief, it has a definite subject, which is treated with the skill of an artist. The portion written in three lines need not frighten amateurs, for the manner in which it is to be played is clearly expressed. The Barcarole has a well-marked and melodious theme, the effect being materially enhanced by a figure in the accompaniment, which is continued throughout the piece. We see no reason for the enharmonic change in the seventh bar, especially as the legitimate notation is adhered to in the following bar. No doubt the composer thought it would be easier to read; but the confusion between G♭ and F♯ makes it, as it appears to us, more difficult. The Serenade is a graceful piece, looking indeed more complicated than it really is. The subject is expressive; and, well sung with the fingers, would be extremely effective. To make it stand forth from the semiquaver accompaniment will, however, require some practice, even with the directions which are very judiciously given. All these pieces demand exceptionally good playing; but it is to the credit of Mr. King that he seeks the praise rather of the few than of the many, and insists, therefore, upon lifting the performer to the level of his music, instead of lowering his music to the level of the performer.

A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea. Chorus with Instrumental Accompaniment. Words by Allan Cunningham. Music by Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Chorus was composed for, and performed by, the Highbury Philharmonic Society, its reception at the Society's Concert on the 5th ult. anticipating that favourable verdict which we have now to pronounce upon the piece, after a more careful consideration of its merits than can be given to it in the concert-room. We may at once say that the musical colouring of words demanding a very large amount of dramatic feeling for their due realisation is so truly sympathetic throughout, that we may confidently look to the composer for a work which will afford him more ample scope for the development of the talent which he undoubtedly possesses. We are especially pleased with the portion in the tonic minor, descriptive of the rising of the tempest, the bold subject in the bass, answered by the tenor in the dominant, being extremely effective; and although this fugal treatment of the theme is but brief, the whole of the writing of the voice parts is powerful and musicianlike, the return to the major being an admirable point. For its due effect no doubt this Chorus demands the accompaniment of the full orchestra; but it has a well-considered pianoforte part, which it need scarcely be said is an integral portion of the composition.

A Slumber Song, for the Pianoforte.

An Old Story. Song. Words by H. E. von Rüdiger. Composed by J. T. Field. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

"SLUMBER SONGS" are somewhat overdone, even Mr. Field must admit; but he nevertheless adds one more to the store, with the conventional monotonous bass, and a melody sufficiently harmless to soothe without irritating. The piece has but small pretensions, yet it is not without a certain grace which we should be glad to recognise in a composition of more importance. We much prefer the song, which tells a story in appropriate music. Of course we have the usual love tale, ending with the shadow of the "silent grave"; but composers will choose these subjects, and vocalists will sing them, so we can scarcely blame publishers for printing them.

Heartsease. Melody, for the Pianoforte. By Ellen Norton. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this little sketch is unknown to us, but she writes elegantly and fluently; and when she has more to say may probably arrest our attention as decisively as she could wish. Meanwhile we may congratulate her upon having acquired the art, of all others the most difficult to a young writer, of keeping within her powers.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first performance at the Paris National Opéra of Verdi's "Aïda," which took place on March 22, under the personal direction of the maestro, resulted in a complete triumph both for the composer and the zealous director, M. Vaucorbeil. This having been the first addition to the répertoire of the national institution under the new régime, French journals have dwelt somewhat grudgingly upon the fact of the productions of native genius having been passed by on this occasion. No such feeling, however, manifested itself among the audience, who were most demonstrative in their enthusiastic appreciation. The entire mise-en-scène of the opera is admitted on all sides to be magnificent, every detail in the matter of Egyptian costumes, scenery, and other stage requisites having been studied and carried out with the minutest care and attention. Similar devotion to the work was shown by the executive artists, although, from a musical point of view, the present performance is said to have been inferior to that of 1876, when "Aïda" was first brought out in the French capital at the Théâtre Ventadour. The principal vocalists at the National Opéra were Mesdames Krauss and Bloch, MM. Sellier and Maurel. During the evening the composer was made the object of a series of ovations; he was presented with a golden lyre, and wreaths and flowers were lavished upon him. Before quitting Paris, the President of the Republic, on the occasion of a brilliantly attended déjeuner given to the maestro, invested him with the insignia of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour, a distinction not hitherto conferred upon any living French composer.

There appears after all to be but little chance of M. Gounod's already much-talked-of new opera "Le Tribut de Zamora" making its début at the Grand-Opéra. A sketch of the work, which has undergone several alterations, was recently given by the composer at the pianoforte at the Opéra, when it is said to have disappointed the expectations naturally raised by every new production emanating from the pen of the most popular composer of modern France. M. Ambroise Thomas's new lyrical drama "Francesca da Rimini" is, on the other hand, in course of preparation at the National Théâtre, where it will shortly be brought out. The libretto, of which M. Jules Barbier is the author, is founded on a well-known episode in Dante's "Divina Commedia," and is said to include, by way of tableaux, impersonations of Virgil, and of Dante and his Beatrice.

Madame Pauline Lucca, after an absence of many years from the Imperial Opera of Berlin, where she had been the declared favourite, made her reappearance at that establishment on the 7th ult., in the title-rôle of Bizet's "Carmen," and again completely turned the heads of the otherwise cool and criticising inhabitants of the Northern capital. Such being the case, it may be inferred, without quoting the confirmatory reports of the local journals, that the diva has lost none of the peculiar charms, both vocal and histrionic, the display of which she has chosen for some considerable length of time to confine almost exclusively to the limits of the Austrian Eldorado. Of course, the adherents of Wagner, who form an increasing sect amongst the Berlin inhabitants, point with natural disdain to the prevailing "Lucca-fever." The Emperor William, on the other hand, who has lately said such pretty things about the "Nibelungen-Tetralogy"—a species of art-work, the general cultivation of which will of necessity prove fatal to the existing "star" worship—has, with an impartial hand, as becomes an Emperor, bestowed upon the lady a costly bracelet in recognition of her high artistic merits.

The anniversary of the birth of the German Emperor was celebrated at the Berlin Opera by a performance of Spontini's spectacular opera "Olympia," on March 22. The choice of this work on the occasion in question, however insignificant in itself, shows at the same time a conspicuous want of tact on the part of the directors of the Imperial establishment. It was this same opera of "Olympia" which the adherents of the then preponderating Italian school of music had pitted against the efforts of C. M. von Weber for the recognition of the national German music-drama successfully made in his "Freischütz," both operas having been almost simultaneously brought out at Berlin in 1821. Similar party considerations do not, of course, now prevail, and Spontini's work will be judged on its own merits alone. It seems strange, nevertheless, that a work written avowedly in an anti-national spirit should have been chosen to celebrate, musically, a national festival.

Wagner's "Nibelungen-Ring" will be repeated at Leipzig during this summer, with the co-operation of Frau Materna, of Vienna, and Herr Jäger, of Bayreuth. The performances of the Tetralogy will be followed by that of "Tristan und Isolde," for which preparations have already been made. During the recent performances of the last-mentioned work, at Munich, a laurel wreath was presented to the able interpreter of Tristan by a deputation of French amateurs present on the occasion.

"Lohengrin" was recently performed, for the first time, at Rome, with great success. A deputation from the Eternal City, having for its object to induce the Bayreuth reformer, at present staying at Naples, to conduct the performance in question, was received by Madame Wagner, her husband being "indisposed." In reply to the petition, the lady said that "Lohengrin, having been composed in the year 1849, there had been ample time during the last thirty years for the production of the work at Rome, and that Herr Wagner, at this late period, must respectfully decline the invitation."

Weber's "Freischütz" was performed at the Teatro Bellini, at Naples, under the title of "Il franco Cacciatore," for the first time on the 3rd ult., and achieved a great success, in spite of a very defective representation.

The Leipzig Stadt-Theater intends shortly to follow up its cyclical performances of the operas of great masters by a series of Gluck's music-dramas, comprising "Orpheus," "Alceste," the two "Iphigenias," and "Armida"—assuredly an undertaking worthy the notice of all amateurs.

The Annual Music Festival of the Lower Rhine will take place during Whitsuntide at Cologne, under the direction of Herr Hiller, and with the co-operation of Madame Clara Schumann and Herr Joachim. The programme includes performances of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," Bach's "Pfingst Cantate," a Cantata by Hiller, and various other important instrumental works by Haydn, Beethoven, Schumann, and Weber.

An international competition of Choral Societies is to take place at Cologne in August next, for which the Emperor and Empress of Germany, and various municipal bodies of the Empire, have granted substantial prizes.

The numerous admirers in this country of the unique genius of Robert Schumann will read, with special satisfaction, the announcement that the widow of the great composer has undertaken to write the biography of her husband, whose works she so well knows how to interpret. All those who are in the possession of autographs or other biographical material relating to the composer are requested to forward the same for inspection to Clara Schumann, Myliusstrasse 32, Frankfurt, Germany.

An opera by Felix Mottl, entitled "Agnes Bernauer," met with a very decided success on its recent first performance at Weimar, and will shortly also be mounted by the Leipzig Stadt-Theater.

We have much pleasure in recording the fact that the works recently published by our occasional contributor Dr. Ludwig Nohl, on Mozart and Haydn respectively, have met with special recognition on the part of the Emperor of Germany and the Empress of Austria.

The fiftieth anniversary of the Choral Society "Cecilia" will take place at the Hague on the 14th and 15th of August next, when the festive proceedings will include an international competition of choir-singing, similar to that announced for the same month at Cologne.

An international musical competition will take place at Brussels on the 25th and 26th of July, and the 8th and 9th of August next, for choral, orchestral, and "fanfare" performances, in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence. All native and foreign military bands, choirs, and orchestral associations will be entitled to compete for the prizes, which will consist of golden medals, varying in value between one hundred and one thousand francs, and of sums of money ranging from one hundred to four thousand francs.

The ceremony of unveiling the monument erected over the grave of Robert Schumann, at Bonn, will take place on the 2nd inst. The two commemorative concerts to be given on this occasion will be conducted by Herren Joachim and Wasielewski, Herr Johannes Brahms being among the executive artists.

Subscriptions are being raised at Vienna for the erection of a marble statue of Joseph Haydn in the beautiful surrounding scenery of the well-known Esterhazy-Park.

At a recent concert of the Cur-Orchester at Wiesbaden, under the able direction of Herr Lüstner, the first performance of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Rhapsodie Ecossaise" met with such a favourable reception that it had to be repeated at the succeeding concert of the institution.

Madame Lemmens-Sherrington has recently appeared at Amsterdam as leading soprano in an excellent performance of Haydn's "Creation," under the direction of M. Verhulst.

Marchetti's new opera "Don Giovanni d'Austria," which was but coolly received on its first production at the Royal Theatre of Turin, has met with more favour on subsequent performances, although, in the opinion of our Turin correspondent, the composer of "Ruy Blas" has not hit the taste of Italian audiences with the work in question.

M. Franz Rummel, the brilliant pianist at present engaged upon a concert-tour in the United States, has quite recovered from an accident recently sustained in the fracture of his leg, and has resumed his artistic progress with his usual success.

We have to record the death of one of the most prominent violinists of modern days, well known to, and highly esteemed by, London audiences, viz., Henri Wieniawski. The deceased artist was born at Lublin, in Poland, in the year 1835, and received his early training as a violinist at the Paris Conservatoire, where, at the age of twelve, he obtained the first prize granted by that institution, which enabled him to pursue independently his studies for the following three years. He subsequently became a travelling virtuoso, visiting Holland, Belgium, France, England, and Germany, in company with his brother, the pianist, thereby establishing his European fame. He was also the author of numerous compositions still highly esteemed by professors of the instrument. Henri Wieniawski died at Moscow, having barely completed his forty-fifth year.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts * recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (April 4): Fragments from "Lohengrin" (Wagner); "Diane," poème antique (Godard); Fragments from "Tannhäuser" (Wagner). Châtelet Concert (April 4): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Conservatoire (April 11): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Choruses from "Sapho" (Louis Lacombe); "Gloria Patri," unaccompanied chorus (Palestrina); Pianoforte Concerto in G (Beethoven); Overture, "Oberon" (Weber). Last Concert Populaire of the Season (April 11): "La Mort de Wallenstein," symphonic poem (d'Indy); Pastorale (R. de Boisdeffre); Sérénade hongroise (Joncières); Danse persane (Guiraud); Larghetto from Symphony in E flat, and Marche Funèbre d'une Marionette (Gounod); "La Zamacueca," for pianoforte (Th. Ritter); Danse macabre (Saint-Saëns); Madrigal (Maupeon); Fragments from "Sylvia" (Délibes); Fragments from Sestet (Beethoven). Pupils' Concert of the Conservatoire (April 25): Fragments from "Messiah" (Handel); Sanctus from Messe Solennelle (Rossini); Choruses from "Oberon" (Weber); Fragment from "Julio Cesare" (Handel).

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (March 18): Symphony, B flat major (Haydn); Airs (Mozart, Bach, Handel); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven). At St. Thomas's Church (March 20): Fugue, C sharp minor (Bach); Prelude and Fugue, F minor (Handel); Offertory (Rheinberger). At St. Thomas's Church (March 29): Kyrie and Gloria from Mass in E flat major (Schubert); Chorus from "Messiah" (Handel).

Breslau.—Orchester-Verein (April 6): Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis" (Gluck); Air from "Iphigenia in Tauris" (Gluck); Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Air, "Zauberflöte," and Overture, "Zauberflöte" (Mozart). Chamber Concert of the same (April 8): String Quartet, F major (B. Scholz); String Quartet, G major, Op. 18 (Beethoven); Vocal soli (Schubert).

Cologne.—Concert of the Verein für Kirchen-Musik (March 15): Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven); Requiem (Th. Gouvy); Recitative and air from "Zauberflöte" (Mozart); "Minnesang," four symphonic movements (E. Merike). Concert Gesellschaft (March 21): "The Messiah" (Handel).

Wiesbaden.—Concert of the Cur-Orchester (April 2): Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52 (Schumann); "Rhapsodie Ecossaise" (Mackenzie); Symphony, "Leonore" (Raff). The same (April 9): Symphony No. 3, E flat major (Mozart); Second Concerto for clarionet (Spohr); Rhapsodie Ecossaise (Mackenzie); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber).

New York.—Concert of the Symphony Society (March 12): Overture, "Penthesilea" (Goldmark); Slavonic Rhapsody, No. 2 (Dvorák); Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); "Tasso," Symphonic Poem (Liszt).

Baltimore.—Peabody Institute (March 13): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Pianoforte solos (Chopin); Roman Carnival (Berlioz); Vocal solos (Grieg, Wagner). The same (March 20): Fourth Norse Suite (A. Hamerik); Overture, "Leonora" No. 3 (Beethoven); Müller Lieder (Schubert). The same (April 3): Ocean Symphony (Rubinstein); Pianoforte solos (Chopin); Norwegian Rhapsody (Joh. S. Svensden); Songs (Rubinstein).

Auburn (N.Y.).—Organ Recitals of T. V. Flagler (March 22 and 29): Fantasie and Fugue, G minor (Bach); Overture, "Lustspiel," orchestra and organ (K. Bela); Allegro from Fifth Symphony (Widor); Bridal March (Leavitt); Pastorale from Sonata in G (Flagler).

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. HULLAH'S REPORT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The "enormous importance, not only from an artistic but from a moral and social point of view . . . . of musical instruction in elementary schools" (to quote from the article in your last issue), is my apology for troubling you with a few remarks upon Dr. Hullah's now celebrated Report.

Considering that Dr. Hullah has for many years adopted a system of teaching singing which he has been engaged ever since in defending, it is not surprising that he should render scant justice to the Chevé method, which he found in the schools of Geneva, and which may be called the antithesis of his own, although he highly praises the results obtained by it in all the schools he visited. If it were merely a question of opinion I should not venture to trouble you with this letter; but Dr. Hullah entirely mistakes the facts of the case when he speaks of Chevé's "system, or more properly, alphabet." It is true that in the Chevé method children are now taught from figures, but the method was first applied by Galin, in 1818, to the staff, and is applicable to any symbols to which a definite meaning can be attached. Galin, and after him Chevé, abandoned the staff in elementary teaching when it was found by experience that the best results could be obtained from figures.

Dr. Hullah must also be under a misapprehension when he regrets "that persons who had given so much time to the study of music could not read it, save out of their own books" (the italics are his). If that be the case in Geneva, it is strangely at variance with the practice elsewhere. If Dr. Hullah had visited a public Chevé class in Paris, he would have found members taking down tunes by ear in figures, transposing them into any required key in the staff, and singing from their MS. Were he to look in at a Chevé class in London he would find the same process going on, and would hear members read part-music from both notations. He would doubtless be surprised to find that though most members had been long familiar with the staff, yet after one or two lessons they could read far more rapidly and accurately from figures. This fact will assist Dr. Hullah in understanding why "any number of otherwise sane persons" (to use words from his Report) should take the trouble to learn another notation than the one he advocates. If, lastly, Dr. Hullah will consult the English edition of the Chevé method, he will find that one-third of the space occupied is devoted to the theoretical and practical teaching of the staff notation. Even had the pupils at Geneva been as yet unacquainted with the staff, I am sure that, after half an hour's explanation of it, they would have sung any passage Dr. Hullah could have written.

Dr. Hullah says: "Nowhere, save in Geneva, did I find, or even hear mention of, any other than the staff notation." Had he visited the neighbouring cantons of Vaud and Neufchatel, he would have found it in all the schools. If he had visited France he would have heard a great deal about the Chevé method. It was, and I believe still is, taught in the elementary schools of St. Petersburg. Had Dr. Hullah met the Director of the Dutch Sunday Schools, the Rev. Adama van Scheltema, he would have found a gentleman who, having tried the English Tonic Sol-fa and discarded it as being too complicated, has enthusiastically adopted the Chevé method, and is not only teaching it in his orphanage of 500 children at Nyningen, but is printing Dutch music in figures. M. de Lange, the foremost Dutch composer, is engaged in translating the English edition into his native tongue, and is confident of its adoption in the Government schools, for the Dutch are not so satisfied with present results as is Dr. Hullah, and are at this moment making inquiry in all directions for another and better method than the one they have.

In his report on the Bavarian schools Dr. Hullah speaks highly of a collection of exercises by F. Wüllner, called "Chorübungen des Münchener Musikschule." He says: "This is one, and I am disposed to think one of the best, of the many works of the same kind with which I made acquaintance during my tour." On reading this I sent to Germany for the work in question. It arrived to-day, and is now before me. The first thing which struck my eye on opening the book was a piece of music written in figures. The only difference between it and the Chevé notation is the substitution of a dash for a dot above or below a figure, to indicate the octaves. I was astounded to find figures—and figures on the tonic principle—in a work recommended by Dr. Hullah: but the following, translated literally from the preface, is still more curious: "I draw special attention to the use of figures, and particularly in their application to all keys. The weakest among our pupils know, as a rule, at the end of the first year, how to indicate in figures all intervals and chords of the major mode, and to apply them to all keys."

In the preface to the second edition the author says: "In the preface to the first edition, as well as in other parts of the book, the importance of exercises in figures is sufficiently dwelt upon. Still their necessity is not universally recognised. I therefore again declare that figure exercises of the kind explained on page 10 are to be employed in all keys, and urgently recommend the master to compose in addition new exercises for each key, like those at No. 47." At this place three tunes are written wholly in figures, and the author says: "After thorough exercises in figures on the blackboard, the following examples in figures in G major are to be sung, naming the figures by the corresponding notes." This is repeated with every change of key throughout the book.

The author also lays great stress upon "chord exercises" in each key—ridiculing the idea of one key being more difficult than another for the singer. These chord exercises are apparently borrowed from Chevé's book, but here they are only in one or two positions; Chevé has them in every possible position.

That there may be no doubt about the tonic principle upon which the figures are used, I refer to page 3 of Part II. Here, in the key of C, C has 1 underneath it. In the key of G, C has 4 under it; in the key of D, C♯ has 7 under it; in the key of A, C♯ has 3 under it; and so on through all the keys.

Having glanced carefully through this book, I am convinced that any value it may have as a means of teaching music is due to the influence of the Chevé notation and theory, but that the Chevé books themselves would be infinitely more serviceable in teaching to read music, both on account of their superior perspicuity and completeness.

One more point and I have done. Dr. Hullah says in his Report, referring to this and other collections of exercises: "Certain it is that a student might pass from beginning to end of some of these 'schools' without ever having studied a single composition written by a great master, indeed, without ever having learnt the name of such an one."

In looking through this collection of Wüllner's I notice the following pieces by "great masters": Palestrina, eight pieces; Handel, nine; J. S. Bach, three; Mozart, one; Orlando Lasso, eight; Cherubini, three: Scarlatti, one;

Durante, three; Leonardo Leo, one; Catel, one; Pitori, two; and several of less note.

It is to be hoped that Dr. Hullah has taken more care in verifying the other facts and inferences appearing in his Report than he appears to have done in this matter of Wüllner's book.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

G. W. BULLEN.

ORCHESTRAL NOTATION.

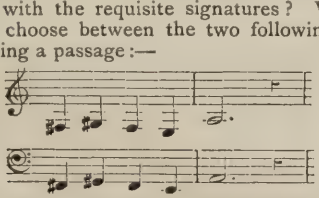
TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—So many generations of composers having passed away without, as far as I am aware, a single remonstrance ever having been raised against the chaotic system adopted in writing for orchestral instruments, it seems rather rash in a young musician of neither influence nor reputation to suddenly uplift his voice and cry for reform. My only excuse is that music is the most conservative of all the arts, and that it is only the young musicians who can push the old ones on.

What I would ask is this: What practical reason can be given for transposing the music of some instruments into relation with the natural scale of those instruments, and not doing so to all—or rather, why do it for any?

A violin-player is not in the least embarrassed by mere change of pitch when he has occasion to play the viola, nor a 'cello-player when he takes up the double-bass. Why then should an oboe-player not be able to play the corno Inglese without having his music transposed a fifth? Has he no ear, no mind, no sense to comprehend that the one instrument is pitched lower than the other? Possibly orchestral players in bygone times were a dull set, but they cannot have been so devoid of musical sense as to play only by finger and not by ear. It seems to me, indeed, that instruments which alter their pitch, as the clarionet and horn, must be extremely perplexing to the player at first, if he have any ear. I know from my own experience how difficult it is, when singing in a choir, if the piece be transposed, to avoid pitching upon a wrong note at every "lead." To this day my father is greatly distressed on first sitting down to a piano to find the pitch more than a semitone higher than it was in his youth.

But my argument here is that the transposition of the music for certain instruments cannot be necessary, else why should it not be general? The trombone is an enormously difficult instrument. Yet whether it stands in E♭, B♭, G or F, the player has to work out the problem of whereabouts his required note lies for himself. Again, the bass tuba and the euphonium, which are saxhorns in E♭ and B♭, are both written as non-transposing instruments, while all the other piston instruments without exception are written for in their particular keys. More absurd still, the ordinary flute stands in D, yet the real notes are written for it, while the E♭, F, and other flutes are written as transposing instruments. The most exasperating anomalies of all, however, occur in writing for the horn. Even granting that this instrument at least should always be written for in the key of C (which I do not see the least necessity for), why should one half of the scale—that written in the G clef—be written an octave higher than the half which is written in the bass clef?* And why should not sharps or flats appear in the signature when required? These absurdities are beginning to be felt very severely now that the German valve-horn in F is—thank goodness!—fast superseding the clumsy old "hand-horn." What possible objection can be raised against at least writing the scale of the new instrument in an uniform manner and with the requisite signatures? Why should we have to choose between the two following awkward ways of writing a passage:—



* The same inconsistency exists in the case of the basset-horn, but this instrument is now superseded by the bass clarionet.

When it might just as well be written—

Or far better with the real notes:—

If the system of writing the real notes were adopted it would only be necessary to use the alto clef for the horns, supplemented by the bass clef for the lowest notes. The same remarks as to signature will apply to the valve trumpet. Nothing is more annoying to the musician than to read the F trumpets and horns together, the one a fourth higher and the other a fifth lower than the notation. Why should a score be made a Chinese puzzle—a puzzle so senseless and gratuitous that writing for the orchestra instead of being a delight is a brain-rending misery? That improvements in notation have been so few during the last century is indeed a marvel. It was long before it was discovered that it would be as well to write the real notes for the drums as to write always C, G. How long will it be before the same discovery is applied to the horns and trumpets? Wagner is the first composer who has had the courage to break through the silly custom of writing for the bass clarionet a major ninth higher than the real sounds. The major second is bad enough. We are slowly struggling clear of the wretched complication of clefs, and perhaps in another fifty years or so it will dawn on musicians that three only are necessary: the treble, alto, and bass. To put the C clef on any line but the middle one is to wantonly confuse an already foggy and clumsy system of notation.

I am well aware that changes such as I suggest must meet with much opposition, but the total abolition of the tenor clef, and the writing of valve-horns and trumpets in their relative keys instead of in C, are reforms within the reach of every musician to make and every player to adopt. The abolition of transposition must be left to a more sensible generation. I would fain be allowed the use of the alto clef for the horns however.—Very truly yours,

F. C.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. Bishop deserves the thanks of all the members and supporters of this great institution for his letter in your last issue. The regret expressed on all hands at the probable demise of the Society warrants the hope that any well-considered and practicable scheme for its reorganisation and re-establishment on a basis more in keeping with the requirements of the times would meet with sufficient acceptance to justify its adoption. The concerts now drawing to a close were announced as "the final series in Exeter Hall" on the ground that that building would not be available for musical purposes after the present season. But the latest published intelligence on that subject states that the efforts which have been made to preserve Exeter Hall for religious and philanthropic purposes have been crowned with success. If this be true, it is surely not too much to expect that it will still be available, on reasonable conditions, for the Society's purposes also; and in that case the alleged cause of the Committee's present embarrassment will no longer exist.

However that may be, it is clear that the suggested reorganisation of the Society must be planned on very different lines from those on which its constitution was laid down nearly half a century ago. Mr. Bishop hits the right nail on the head in hinting that "a far less exclusive policy should have been adopted by the Committee as regards the election of new members." But I would go further, and say that the recognised aims and pursuits of the Society should be such as to attract and secure the hearty co-operation of all genuine and enthusiastic amateurs, and this on such financial conditions as would render it independent of the capricious support of the public.

I would respectfully suggest that, if the Committee and the present little circle of members find themselves unequal to the elaboration of a scheme calculated to effect the desired object, a suitable appeal, on the ground of the splendid service rendered by the Society to their art in past years, should be made to some of our more prominent musicians, professional and amateur, to make common cause with them, and thus avert the impending crisis. Any idea that "vested interests" should be primarily considered will, I am sure, be scouted by all who take worthy views of the matter.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES E. ASHLEY.

CHOPIN'S PRELUDES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It is always painful to have to give up cherished beliefs, and to do so without resistance is hardly natural, if possible. The story of Chopin's Preludes having been composed at Majorca, in the old and nearly deserted Carthusian Monastery in the winter of 1838-39, has been supported by the high authority of Georges Sand's autobiographical statement, and so far in detail that one Prelude, that in B minor, is now for ever coupled by her, as to its inspiration and composition, with her absence from the monastery during a violent spate or storm-flood in the island. This occurrence has been referred to quite lately by Dr. F. Hueffer, in his admirable monograph on Chopin published in the Fortnightly Review (September, 1877); and must be well known to all those who have cared to inquire about the friendship that existed between the two great artists. There is a religious depth of feeling in several of those wonderful sketches that is in direct relation to the romantic circumstances in which Chopin was placed.

Fontana, the editor of Chopin's posthumous works, a fellow-student with him at Warsaw, and always an ardent disciple as well as his intimate friend, told me that he received from Majorca the MSS. of the Preludes as they were written, being intrusted with the revision of the proofs for immediate publication, a statement that coincides with Georges Sand's narration. Now, in Germany, in No. 2 (1880) of "Gartenlaube," Herr Stavenow, relying upon the high authority of Gutmann, a favourite pupil and very dear friend of Chopin's, comes forward with a statement, repeatedly he says asserted by his informant, that the Preludes were composed in Paris, and were sold by Chopin in August, 1838, to Camille Pleyel for 2,000 francs, Gutmann copying them out for the engraver, and the receipt of this money enabling Chopin to proceed to Majorca. I think both statements are partly true and may be reconciled. Chopin had very likely written in August, 1838, the more important Preludes, and sold them; but Pleyel requiring twenty-four (fourteen for the first book, and ten for the second), Chopin, then in Majorca, composed and sent some of the shorter and more solemn, as a kind of make-weight, consigning them to Fontana, who was in Paris at the time. Fontana was a man of high character, incapable, I think, of intentional falsehood.—Yours truly,

Kensington, April 8, 1880. A. J. HIPKINS.

MR. H. WALL AND COPYRIGHT MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. H. Wall is still continuing his operations. A few weeks since, my wife played a pianoforte solo, entitled "Skating Polka," at an entertainment in connection with a Sunday School Institute in Lambeth. Last week she received, through the gentleman who presided on the occasion, a letter from a "Mr. H. Wilson," asking the name of the composer of the piece "so brilliantly performed." In her reply to this polite request, my wife gave her address, and thus furnished the information needed by Mr. J. C. Hyett, solicitor, 8, Colebrooke Row, Islington (late of 5, Hind Court, Fleet Street), who demands, on behalf of "Mr. H. Wall," payment of two pounds. Failing the receipt of this amount within two days, legal proceedings will be taken. I purpose resisting this claim, and beg to suggest to those who take part in entertainments for benevolent purposes, and afterwards receive "Mr. Wall's" communications, that they should not too readily accede to his demands. There may be differences of opinion as to the state of the law upon the subject, but public opinion will surely demand the amendment of certain Acts, if, by their obscurity, they countenance such proceedings as this. When "all rights are reserved" the fact should be distinctly stated on the cover of the music. I learn that the manager of the entertainment has received a similar demand, for having "caused or permitted" the solo to be performed.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

Forest Hill, April 19. F. T. GAMMON.

SPEED OF HYMN-TUNES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—With your permission I should be glad to say a few words in your valuable paper touching the speed at which hymn-tunes are taken nowadays.

The subject appears to me of the utmost importance now that there are signs of the musical education of the people being taken in hand. The one thing that strikes us in England is the apparent total want of National Song. I include in this term "National Song" both sacred and secular, but confine my present remarks to the sacred.

If we go into any church in this country I do not think we shall find one where there is any real congregational singing. I am well aware of the fact that some musicians of standing have deprecated congregational singing, but I do not think that many would now agree with them. There is in some congregations a manifest attempt to follow the tune, but with no better success than a general hum; there is no singing in the true sense of the word.

What I want is to get the various opinions of organists and others interested in the question, so that if possible some understanding may be arrived at. The remedy I suggest, having experienced its good effect on the rare occasions on which I have been allowed my own way, is, the taking of the tunes at a slow pace.

I appeal to any musician who has ever heard the German chorale in its own land to support me in my suggestion. I cannot quote Bach, as he gives no tempo-marks to his chorals, but I would point to the metronome tempi to the chorals Mendelssohn introduces into his oratorios.

Apologising for the length of this letter, which I hope may call forth replies,—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD J. HOPPER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

W. BAILEY.—In tuning pianofortes, as in many other things, a little knowledge is of little practical value. A tuner, to gain a living by his art, must be tolerably efficient, and such efficiency is never secured under two or three years of close application in a piano factory where the instruments are what is called "rough"—that is, have not yet been brought by repeated tuning to standing in tune. The pupil should be young enough, at least at first, not to have the hand fully grown, and skill in "fine" tuning as well as experience have to be gained after the workshop time is past. It should be evident, therefore, to any one who will reflect, that a few months' study, even if constant, will neither qualify the student to gain a competent income, nor do more than teach a tyro to make indifferent octaves and unisons where they happen to have been worse than it is usual to endure.

STRIVER.—Your earnest letter assures us that you will attain your object in time. You cannot do better than persevere in the course you have taken; but do not keep exclusively to exercises, or your musical feeling will remain dormant.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The piece of music you send us is altogether incorrect.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERGAVENNY.—On Wednesday, the 21st ult., the Abergavenny Choral Society gave the second Concert of the season at the Town Hall before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Bateman, R.A.M., Miss Augusta Morgan, and Mr. Wilson, who, with the assistance of a band of twenty performers, gave an excellent rendering of Haydn's Third Mass. The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection of glees, songs, instrumental solos, &c. Miss Bateman won encores for her rendering of Macfarren's song "Pack clouds away" (flute obbligato, Mr. T. Jones), and Cowen's song "Spinning"; as did Miss Bishop for Balfe's song "Killarney," and Miss Augusta Morgan for "The better land." The violin and violoncello solos by Messrs. Woodward and Teague met with very warm approval. The chorus-singing was very good, especially in the last part-song "The stars are with the voyagers." Mr. R. Bartholomew's conducting was all that could be desired.

ALDERSHOT.—The members of the Holy Trinity Musical Society, assisted by friends, gave a Concert, consisting of vocal and instrumental music, in the Assembly Rooms, on Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., when there was a large attendance. By the kind permission of Colonel Harnett and officers the band of the 7th (Princess Royal's) Dragoon Guards was present, and performed an excellent selection of pieces, under the direction of their bandmaster, Mr. Poole. Mr. J. Conway Brown, L.Mus. T.C.L., Organist of the Parish Church, Farnham, played a violin solo, which was charmingly rendered. The programme was a varied and well-selected one, and was carried out with the greatest success, the part-songs and choruses especially being warmly applauded. A clarionet solo with pianoforte accompaniment, by Corporal Marshall and Miss E. Gray, was a great feature in the Concert, and Miss M. Gray was very good in her song "Waiting," as was also Miss Herbert in "Olivia," the latter vocalist being awarded a richly deserved encore. The strings to complete the orchestral accompaniments were contributed by Mr. J. Conway Brown, with his family and pupils.

ATHERSTONE.—On Friday, the 9th ult., the Concert for the benefit of the Atherstone Cricket Club took place in the Corn Exchange. Miss Emily Paget, of the Royal Academy of Music, and Mr. Paget kindly gave their services on the occasion, the other vocalists being Miss G. Fox, Mr. Turner, and Mr. L. A. Hallsworth. Miss Paget's songs and Miss Mingay's playing on the violin, accompanied by Mr. Harper on the pianoforte, were features in the programme.

BABBACOMBE, TORQUAY.—On Thursday, the 8th ult., a successful Concert was given by Mr. Claude R. Fowles, Organist of All Saints' Parish Church. The vocalists were Miss K. B. Hearder, Miss Herrin, Rev. A. H. Walker, and Mr. A. Pridham. Miss Hearder received an encore for "Roberto o tu che adoro," and Miss Herrin gave "Comin' thro' the rye," in response to an encore for "At the ferry." A band of twelve instrumentalists played the Overture to Figaro, and a March in D (MS.), written especially for the occasion by Mr. Charles Heaviside, who presided at the American organ. Mr. C. R. Fowles, who conducted, gave a pianoforte solo, and Mr. Sparke two violin solos, which were encored.

BECKENHAM.—A Concert was given on Tuesday, the 13th ult., by Mr. Coles's permanent choir of local amateurs. The first part consisted of selections from Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm; the solos, duet, quartet, and choruses being excellently rendered by the choir. Miss Kirby sang Sullivan's "St. Agnes' Eve" with much expression. Part II. opened with the Overture to Fra Diavolo as a duet for piano and harmonium, which was followed by a portion of Macfarren's May Day, Mrs. Radcliffe's singing as the May Queen being especially commendable. A novel feature in the programme was the excellent rendering of Smart's "When brighter suns" by two boys of the Parish Church choir. Part-songs, solos, &c., concluded a highly successful Concert. Mr. Arthur Carnall, Mus. Bac., and Mr. E. Scovell accompanied at the piano and harmonium respectively, with much taste and ability; and Mr. Sydney R. Coles, F.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

BELFAST.—On Thursday, the 8th ult., a very successful Concert was given by the children of St. Paul's Orphanage, in St. Mary's Hall. The choruses and part-songs were rendered in a style that indicated the careful training of the choirmaster, Mr. W. H. Flood. Particular mention must be made of the artistic singing of the part-song "They came from a land," composed by Mr. Flood, which was warmly received by the numerous audience. The programme was miscellaneous, and every item was well rendered, Miss E. Doherty in "If" (Pinsuti) and "Kathleen Mavourneen" (Crouch), Mr. P. Kearns in "Madoline" and "The blue Alsatian mountains" (Adams), Mr. T. Picton in "Let me like a soldier fall" (Wallace) and "Then you'll remember me" (Balfe), Miss Browne in Harrison's "In the gloaming," and Mr. Murphy in "Non e ver" (Mattei), being especially worthy of commendation. Two flute solos were performed by Mr. Strange in a manner which elicited great applause. Mr. D. J. Burns was an efficient accompanist.——The Philharmonic Society brought its season to a close on the 9th ult., by a most interesting Concert. The first part was occupied by Smart's Cantata, The Bride of Dunkerron. As might have been reasonably expected, after so considerable a training under the bâton of a Conductor so eminently accomplished as Sir Robert P. Stewart, a creditable performance was given, the choruses being rendered not only with care and precision, but with that true dramatic feeling which they demand, and the solo vocalists—Miss Ellen Lamb, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Carleton—giving much effect to the music with which they were intrusted. The second part was miscellaneous.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.—The Choral Union gave its Annual Oratorio Concert on Wednesday, the 7th ult., the work being Handel's Judas Maccabæus. The choir was well balanced, and gave a capital rendering of the choruses, the performance being marked by great steadiness and precision, together with a unity and vigour in attacking all the leads. The solo singers were Miss Jenny Robinson, Mr. Thornton Wood, Mr. Thomas Richardson, and a member of the Society (who gave the tenor solos and recitatives), all of whom created a marked effect. A small but efficient string orchestra, from Edinburgh and Glasgow, performed the accompaniments in an excellent manner. Miss Cuthbertson officiated at the organ, and Mr. Barker conducted with his usual skill.

BIDEFORD.—Thanks to the Vocal Union, under the conductorship of Mr. Backhouse, the first oratorio performance ever given in Bideford took place on Wednesday, March 31, Haydn's Creation being selected for the occasion. From beginning to end the whole performance was a veritable success; principals, band, and chorus appeared to vie with each other as to which should bear away the palm, and it would be difficult indeed to decide, to whom it should be awarded. Miss Julia Jones proved herself an accomplished singer. Mr. Harper Kearton fully sustained the good reputation he acquired on his former visit, and Mr. Wharton, who appeared in place of Mr. Horscroft, seemed to give general satisfaction. Of the chorus it is impossible to speak too highly.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. Stratton brought his first season of Popular Chamber Concerts to a close on the 23rd of March, with the following programme: String Quartet in E minor (Verdi); Sonata in A flat, pianoforte (Richard Wagner); Sonata in A, Op. 69, pianoforte and violoncello (Beethoven); Capriccio in F, Fantasia in C minor, pianoforte (Handel and Bach); and Trio in A, pianoforte and strings (Balfe). The artists were the same as on former occasions so far as the string parts were concerned, Mr. Stratton being the pianist. The quartet and trio were given for the first time in Birmingham. There was a large and highly appreciative audience.——The Philharmonic Union gave a performance of Handel's Messiah in the Town Hall on the evening of Good Friday. The vocal principals were the Misses Yates, Mr. Welch, and Mr. Harrison. Mr. Stimpson gave the accompaniments upon the organ, and Dr. Heap conducted. There was a large audience, and the Oratorio was well rendered.——Messrs. Harrison's last Subscription Concert for the present season was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 1st ult. The artists engaged included the Misses Robertson, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; Mr. Walter Bache, pianoforte; Mr. Davis, harp; Mr. Stimpson, organ; and Mr. W. Ganz, Conductor. The programme was of a popular character, and appeared to give satisfaction to the large and fashionable audience.——The Festival Choral Society concluded its current season on the 8th ult. with a fine performance of Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, Op. 98, and Max Bruch's Cantata The Lay of the Bell. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Orridge, Miss Emilie Harris, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Frederic King. The band numbered about sixty performers, and there was a full chorus. Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ, and Mr. Stockley conducted.——At the Saturday Evening Popular Concerts, on the 10th ult., Mendelssohn's Athalie was given by the Birmingham Musical Association, under the direction of Mr. Stockley. The principal soprano music was effectively sung by Mrs. Titterton, and the lyrics were recited by Mr. Charles Fry, who also gave a scene from the School for Scandal in the second part of the Concert, which was received with hearty applause. Mr. Stimpson presided at the organ.——The Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union gave an Orchestral Concert in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening, the 14th ult., in aid of the Irish Relief Fund. The vocalists were Miss Orridge and Mr. Seligmann, who gave songs and a duet in admirable style. The band played several Overtures and Haydn's Ninth Symphony with much effect, and also a Caprice à la Bourrée, composed for the occasion by the Conductor, Mr. C. J. Duchemin. Mr. S. S. Stratton officiated as accompanist. The Concert was very successful artistically, but the attendance was not very large.——The last of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts for the present season took place in the Town Hall on Thursday, the 22nd ult. The vocalists were Miss Eleanor Farnol (a Birmingham lady, student of the National Training School for Music), Fraulein Schauenburg, and Mr. Blower. All displayed high qualities, and their selections were warmly applauded. The programme included Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, the Overtures to Mirella (Gounod), Coriolanus (Beethoven), and The Ruler of the Spirits (Weber), and an "Allemand" by Mr. Thomas Anderton. All these pieces were admirably given, the band being now in a high state of efficiency. Miss Agnes Miller gave a fine rendering of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, and also of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, Op. 31. Mr. Rowland M. Winn was an able accompanist, and Mr. Stockley conducted in his usual masterly style. He is to be congratulated on having formed so good an orchestra from local sources chiefly.——The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave a six nights' season at the Theatre Royal, commencing on the 12th ult. The works performed were Carmen (twice), Il Trovatore, Mignon, The Taming of the Shrew, and Lucia di Lammermoor. There were crowded houses all the week.——Mr. Sims Reeves sang in The Waterman and The Beggars' Opera at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on the 19th and 22nd ult., and was announced to appear in Guy Mannering on the 24th ult. Mr. Reeves sang the many well-known ballads in the above-mentioned works in his best style, and his performance elicited constant and enthusiastic applause from a crowded audience.

BOGNOR.—An excellent Concert was given on the 6th ult., by the Chichester Glee and Madrigal Union (Miss Alice Osmond, Messrs. W. R. Young, F. Bailey, C. E. Pillow, and Seymour Kelly). The programme consisted of madrigals, part-songs, songs, &c., which were much appreciated by the audience. The Misses Edith and Marie Osmond played two pianoforte duets, and Mr. Edward Osmond acted as accompanist.

BOXLEY.—A most enjoyable Concert was given by Mr. Francis Howell, of Maidstone, assisted by the leading amateurs of the neighbourhood, Mr. W. Whitehead (solo violinist), of Sevenoaks, Mr. Parsons, of Maidstone, and members of the Boxley Choir, on Tuesday, March 30. The programme, which was miscellaneous, commenced with Mendelssohn's Volkslied "Parting and meeting," expressively sung by a select number of the choir. Mr. Whitehead gave a masterly performance on the violin of a favourite air by Himmel, with Blagrove's variations. Miss Richards gave a charming rendering of Mr. Howell's song "Lovely rose," and Mr. Parsons was very successful in Balfe's song "Come into the garden, Maud." The choir was well received in "The birthday," a part-song by Mr. F. Howell; and "March comes apace," a solo from Mr. Howell's Song of the Months, was finely rendered by the Rev. Thomas Constable, and much applauded. Mr. Howell presided at the pianoforte the greater part of the evening, and to his exertions much of the success is due.

BRADFORD.—Mr. Arthur T. Akeroyd gave two Organ Recitals on the 6th and 10th ult. respectively, in Christ Church, assisted at the first by Miss Sweeney and Mr. F. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac., and at the second by Miss Sweeney and Mr. Blagbro. The programmes were varied and well selected, and there was a large and attentive audience at each Recital.

BRIGG.—The second Concert this season of Mr. Cray's Choral Society was given in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday, the 13th ult., when, amongst other works, Schubert's Song of Miriam was given by a band and chorus of about eighty performers. The solos were sung by Miss Thompson, Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley. The Concert was a complete success. Mr. C. W. Cray conducted.

BRIGHTON.—The thirty-fourth season of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society and Musical Union began on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., when the first of a series of three private Concerts took place in the Banqueting Room, Royal Pavilion. The audience was numerous, and very appreciative. The first part of the programme consisted of a sacred Cantata entitled Jerusalem, written expressly for this Concert, and conducted by the composer, Mr. F. J. Sawyer, B. Mus., Oxon., F.C.O., the present organist of St. Patrick's Church, Hove. Mr. Sawyer has previously published some short but solidly finished works for pianoforte, organ, and voice, which have evinced his command of musical resources, and shown some degree of inventive power; and in this work he has concentrated all his powers, with the skill in producing vocal effect which only intimacy with a trained chorus can bring. The Cantata is entirely lyrical in form, and in three parts—"The Foundation," "The Destruction," and "The Restoration," containing in all twenty separate pieces, which are choruses, recitatives, and airs of the accustomed shape. The music may be stated as of the Mendelssohn school in its general outlines, and in the conception of most of the themes; further in the clearness and finish of form which characterise nearly all the numbers. Reminiscences are to be occasionally detected, but never obtrude themselves in an offensive manner, as is the case in so many works of the kind. Upon the orchestral writing no opinion can be pronounced, as the accompaniments were played as a duet for pianoforte and harmonium. Being upon the whole very well performed, Mr. Sawyer's Cantata made a most favourable impression; two solos and a chorus were encored, while hearty, unanimous, and prolonged applause at the conclusion showed how the audience appreciated the work as a whole. Mr. Sawyer conducted with evident tokens of special ability in that direction. A miscellaneous selection from Handel's sacred and secular works formed the second part of the Concert.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, the 12th ult., Mr. Riseley's excellent series of Monday Popular Concerts were resumed in the Colston Hall, after an interval of more than three months, caused by the inability of the Conductor to obtain the hall. The band of fifty performers again showed the result of careful training in the performance of an excellent selection of music, consisting of Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 (Op. 68, the "Pastorale"), the overtures Le Cheval de Bronze (Auber), and Abu Hassan (Weber); the Cornelius March, a "Canzonetta" (Mendelssohn), and the entr'acte from Schubert's Rosamunde. Miss M. Spencer-Jones, R.A.M., and Mr. J. H. Grantley were the vocalists, and both succeeded in winning the good opinion of a very large audience. Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted, as usual.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The St. Edmunds Glee Club gave a Complimentary Concert to the Conductor, Mr. T. B. Richardson, on the 8th ult., at the Athenæum, under distinguished patronage. A large and fashionable audience testified to the great respect in which Mr. Richardson is held. An excellent programme was presented, and the various part-songs were rendered with great precision, due regard being paid to the observance of light and shade. An interesting feature at the Concert was the début of the Conductor's daughter, Miss Ida Richardson, who received enthusiastic plaudits for her very fine rendering of Hummel's grand pianoforte Concerto in A minor (first movement) with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Winterbon was an able accompanist to the vocal music, and Mr. T. B. Richardson conducted with his usual ability.

CHELTENHAM.—Mr. J. A. Matthews's last Subscription Concert of the tenth season took place on Tuesday, the 6th ult., in the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise. The second part was miscellaneous, and included Suppé's Overture, Poet and Peasant, and Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony, which was received with great favour. The principal singers were Miss Marian Williams, Miss Eva Neate, and Mr. Alfred Kenningham. The choruses and part-songs were finely rendered by the members of the Choral Society, assisted by an excellent band of instrumentalists, numbering altogether 150 performers.

CLIFTON.—On Friday, the 2nd ult., the Clifton Amateur Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Dr. Macfarren's Cantata The Lady of the Lake, for the benefit of St. Andrew's Schools, Montpelier, in the Victoria Rooms. The solo vocalists were Madame Brettelle, Miss Kate Hayes, Mr. E. T. Morgan, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. Thomas, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were sung by the Choir of the Society, which consists of about seventy ladies and gentlemen. Altogether the performance was a thoroughly good one, and the impression created by the Cantata was most favourable, the applause being very frequent. Miss Pearce was the pianist, and Mr. D. W. Rootham conducted.——On Saturday, the 3rd ult., the first of a series of Concerts in aid of the fund for repairing the Organ at Clifton College was given in the College, and was very largely attended. The total cost of the repairs is estimated at £100, and in order to raise that amount the Committee of the College Musical Society have organised a series of Concerts, the result of the first being eminently satisfactory. The Choir numbered 120 vocalists, all connected with the College, and the orchestral band thirty-four performers. Mr. W. F. Trimnell conducted.

COVENTRY.—The twelfth Concert of the Musical Society, and the last of the present season, took place in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., when an excellent performance of Elijah was given under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Trickett. The Overture was well played, and served to show the admirable material of which the band is composed. The principal vocalists were Madame Emma Beasley, Miss Isabel Chatterton, Mr. Kenningham, and Herr Henschel. The subordinate parts were well rendered by Miss Hill, Miss Hinde, Mr. Mason, Mr. Sutton, and Mr. Ward, members of the Society.

DALTON-IN-FURNESS.—A very successful performance of Judas Maccabæus was given on Thursday, the 1st ult., by the members of the Dalton Choral Society, assisted by the following principals: Miss Fanny Bristow, Miss Baxendale, Mr. S. Thornborough, and Mr. Higginson. The band, numbering thirty performers, was led by Mr. Jones, of Lancaster, with Mr. E. Nicholl, of Manchester, principal violoncello. Mr. Parkinson, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted, and great praise is due to him for the manner in which the music was performed, and for the efficient state of the Society.

DONNINGTON.—On Easter Tuesday the Lilleshall Musical Society, assisted by some other ladies and gentlemen, gave a performance of the greater part of The Messiah, in one of the large iron worksheds at the Midland Ironworks, near to Donnington Station. The workshed alluded to (kindly lent by Mr. Walker, the proprietor), was divided by a wooden partition, forming a room capable of holding over a thousand people. A floor was laid over the whole, and a capacious platform was erected for the orchestra and choir. The vast space above was webbed with wires, in order to convey the sound better, and there could hardly have been found a more suitable place for the purpose. The Society had no wish to make the affair one for pecuniary benefit: its members desired to give an opportunity for the inhabitants of the neighbourhood generally to listen to some of the best music, and they have succeeded. The principal vocalists were Miss Ellis, Miss Diggens, Mrs. Turner, Miss Hipkiss, Mr. Grayson, and Mr. E. Pownall. The choruses, too, were excellently sung; and in every respect the Concert was a decided success, Mr. Nicholls, the Conductor, being warmly congratulated at the conclusion of the performance upon the result of his efforts.

DOWNHAM.—The second and last Concert of the Philharmonic Society for the present season was given in the Public Hall on Thursday evening, the 1st ult., before a numerous audience. The programme included the Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio," and Mozart's Twelfth Mass, followed by a miscellaneous second part. The band was under the able leadership of Mr. J. Bray, and superior amateur assistance was rendered by Mrs. J. J. Nunn, Miss Helen Johnson, Rev. G. Carroll, and Mr. W. H. Poole. The choruses were given with much steadiness and precision. Miss Johnson received warm applause for her song "The bend of the river," as did also Mrs. Nunn for "Marguerite," and both ladies were encored. Mr. T. C. Carey conducted.

DUNEDIN, NEW ZEALAND.—Signor Morley's Concert at the Garrison Hall, on Friday, February 26, was very well attended and proved a thorough success. The programme was similar to that of the first Concert of the season given by Signor Morley, and embraced many of the items of the previous entertainment. The choir, consisting of about two dozen voices, was thoroughly efficient. "The New Zealand Anthem," the words by a well-known local poet, Mr. Thomas Bracken, and the music by Mr. Woods, of Lawrence, opened the Concert, and was highly successful. "Behold how brightly breaks the morning" (Masaniello), the Choruses from The Two Brides, "Hail to liberty" (Semiramide), &c., received full justice, and were much appreciated by the audience. The Misses Hume, besides taking part in a Trio from Un Ballo in Maschera, and in the Quartet from Rigoletto, sang the duet "Giorno d' orrore" (Semiramide), with even more success than at the former Concert. The Misses Hume were also most effective in their vocal solos, several being encored. Signor Morley, Miss Lack, Mr. R. Watson, and Mr. Murray, were highly appreciated, and some of their solos were redemanded. Herr Otto Schweers acted as accompanist.

DUNFERMLINE.—The members of the Dunfermline Choral Union, assisted by an efficient orchestra, principally from Edinburgh, and Dr. Peace, organist, Glasgow, gave a performance of Handel's Messiah in St. Margaret's Hall, on Tuesday, March 30. Mr. William Harrison, of Edinburgh, conducted. The chorus and orchestra numbered about 150, and the solos were undertaken by members of the Union. The choral portion of the work was deserving of the highest praise, there being throughout great exactness in time and also attention to expression. The solos were taken by Miss Wilson and Miss Reid (soprano), the Misses Mullan (alto), Mr. Beveridge (tenor), and Mr. Munro and Mr. Grieve (bass). The orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, was very efficient.

EASINGWOLD.—The Easingwold Choral Society held its first Concert of the season on Friday evening, the 9th ult., and gave the first and second parts of Haydn's Oratorio The Creation, the performance of which was greatly assisted by a string band from York. Miss Johnson presided at the piano. The soloists were Miss Mullins, Mr. Suthers, and Dr. Witz, all of whom were highly effective. The choruses were well rendered, and reflected great credit on Mr. Bensley (Organist and Choirmaster of Easingwold Church), the Conductor, who has evidently bestowed much pains upon the training of the chorus. The large room of the Town Hall was well filled, and the applause was frequent and enthusiastic.

EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley gave an Organ Recital to the members of the Edinburgh Choral Union and some of the church choirs in the Music Class-room, on Monday, March 29. Introductory to the Recital, Sir Herbert made a few remarks, in which he expressed his interest and sympathy in the Choral Union, of which he had been president for fourteen years; and particularly dwelt upon the remarkable development, both in choral and orchestral music, which has occurred in the last fifteen years. In speaking of the love for national songs, he said: "But this inherent feeling for melody should not be mistaken either for musical talent or musical culture. It has indeed been noticed with some truth that those countries which have produced the fewest composers, and in which the art of music is least cultivated, have, as a natural consequence, possessed a large stock of national melodies. Perhaps this rich heritage of national songs has long caused an undervaluing or want of appreciation of artistic culture in the divine art. However this is, I repeat, and it must be obvious to you all, that there has been of late years a great and gratifying enlargement of ideas and a general awakening in musical matters, giving promise of general enlightenment. In many points, especially as regards the association of music with religion, public feeling has, even in my recollection, undergone great change. The senior members of this Union may remember the strange confusion of ideas which, twenty years ago, was of by no means limited extent here—that to attend the performance of an oratorio was a sure sign of a man going to the bad, if not absolutely wicked. An instance of this occurred soon after I came here. I sent to one of my students a ticket for one of the Choral Union Concerts—I think it was for 'Israel in Egypt'— in 1868 or 1869. This was done in recognition of his diligence, and as advancing his musical education. By the next post the ticket was returned, with the remark that he could not reconcile it with his conscience as a Christian to go either to a theatre or an oratorio." Sir Herbert then performed an excellent selection of compositions by the best masters, which was listened to with much interest.——The experiment of giving a Concert of sacred music on the evening of a Fast Day, which was tried so successfully by the members of the Edinburgh Select Choir in October last, induced the management to announce an entertainment of a similar character in the Music Hall, on the 22nd ult. The programme included the 100th Psalm (cleverly arranged as a motett, in eight parts, by Dr. Pole); Schubert's anthem, "The Lord is my Shepherd" (for first and second trebles, and first and second altos, with pianoforte accompaniment); Palestrina's sacred madrigal, "Christ of the Holy Angels' Light," and Goss's "O Saviour of the world." The chorus numbered thirty voices, and the parts were fairly well balanced. The Concert opened with Macfarren's "A day in Thy courts," and a very fine part-song of Smart's, in the key of E minor, "An old Church song," Hatton's "Hark, the convent bells are ringing," and one of Dr. Wesley's finest anthems, "Blessed be the God and Father," were sung with great finish and smoothness. A very simple and pleasing hymn-tune, "Saviour, when in dust to Thee," by Mr. Wm. Barr, a member of the choir, was also very tastefully rendered by the choir, and several vocal solos were well sung, some organ pieces (excellently performed by Mr. Hartley) completing an attractive Concert. Mr. Hartley was an efficient Conductor.

Glasgow.—Mr. H. A. Lambeth's Choir appeared at the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts on March 27, when an excellent programme was provided and exceedingly well rendered. Great praise is due to James Airlie, Esq., the courteous and energetic Secretary of the Abstainers' Union, for his untiring efforts to provide high-class performances for these very popular Concerts.——The Glasgow Select Choir held its Annual Plébiscite Concert on the evening of March 27, in the St. Andrew's Hall. The programme included "Sleep, baby, sleep," "The murmuring tree tops" (Mendelssohn), "Kate Dalrymple" (Archer), "Sweet and low" (Barnby), &c., all of which were given with good taste. A new part-song specially written for the choir by Mr. Henry Lahee (who gained the premium of £10, given by Mr. Archer for the best part-song), entitled "The bells," was also given. Mr. James Allen conducted, and Mr. W. D. Swan proved an efficient accompanist.——The members of the Caledonian Railway Musical Association gave their annual Concert in the Queen's Rooms, on March 30. Mr. William Moodie conducted, Mr. John Turnbull and Mr. Hall presiding respectively at the piano and harmonium.——The Annual Concert of the Pollokshields Musical Association was held on the 6th ult., in the Assembly Rooms, McLean Street, before a large and appreciative audience. The work presented was Hoffmann's Legend of the Fair Melusina. The various characters were well interpreted by members of the Society, all of whom had bestowed great care upon their respective parts. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 1, No. 1, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was exceedingly well rendered. Signor L. Zavertal proved a careful Conductor. Mr. Thomas Berry (piano) and Mr. W. D. Swan (harmonium) were efficient accompanists.

Govan.—On Wednesday, March 31, the choir in connection with Dean Park Parish Church gave its Annual Service of sacred music, the Rev. J. T. Graham presiding. The programme included Sir John Goss's Anthem, "O taste and see"; Gloria, from Mozart's Twelfth Mass; Hallelujah (Messiah); the duet "Love divine," from Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus; the soli "O rest in the Lord" (Elijah), and "Come unto Me," by Coenen. The chief novelty, however, was Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, the rendering of which was worthy of all praise, the contralto solo being sung with true artistic expression. Mr. Thomas Berry, Organist of Trinity Church, presided at the harmonium, and the whole performance reflected much credit on the careful training of the Conductor, Mr. A. Blair.

Great Marlow.—Barnett's Ancient Mariner and a miscellaneous programme were given by the Choral Society on the 6th ult., with full orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Allchin, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Wethered, Mr. A. L. Fryer, and Mr. A. G. Crane were principal soloists. The pieces most worthy of note were Miss Vernon's singing of Gounod's "La messagiera d' amor," Mr. Crane's "None can fly" (Zampa), and Mr. Fryer's "Oh! 'tis a glorious sight" (Oberon). Mr. F. W. J. Chaundy conducted.

Greenock.—A large and critical audience assembled in the Town Hall on the 19th ult., on the occasion of the performance by the Greenock Choral Union of Handel's Oratorio The Messiah. The solo vocalists were Miss Kemlo Stephen, Miss Annie Cochrane, Mr. Alex. Macpherson, and Mr. John Currie, Dr. A. L. Peace, organist. The Overture and "Pastoral Symphony" were played by Dr. Peace on the organ in a manner which effectively displayed the capabilities of the instrument. Mr. Macpherson's rendering of "Comfort ye" and "Every valley" was most satisfactory; and the bass solo, "Thus saith the Lord," was very impressively given by Mr. Currie, his voice showing to great advantage, especially in the lower register. Miss Cochrane, who has already made several appearances in Greenock, fully sustained the favourable impression she had created. The soprano recitatives and solos were sung by Miss Stephen with the taste and finish of a true artist. The choruses were well rendered, "And the glory," "For unto us," and "Lift up your heads," being specially deserving of notice. Mr. Westwood Tosh conducted.

Halifax.—Dr. Roberts gave his fourth Organ Recital in the Parish Church on Friday evening, the 23rd ult. The Church was filled with an appreciative audience, and the following excellent programme was submitted: Grand Sonata (No. 6), Mendelssohn; Entr'acte (Manfred), Reinecke; March (Cornelius), Mendelssohn; Ave Maria, Cherubini; Overture and Minuet (Samson), Handel; Prelude and Fugue in G minor (Book viii.) and Toccata et Fuga in D minor (Book iv.), J. S. Bach; "Dona nobis pacem" (Third Mass), Mozart; "He gave them hailstones" (Israel in Egypt), Handel. An offertory in aid of the Churchwardens' expenses amounted to £14.

Heeley, Sheffield.—The members of the Heeley Harmonic Society gave their sixth Invitation Concert on Wednesday, the 21st ult., in the Thirlwell Road School-room. Dr. J. V. Roberts's Cantata Jonah (first time in Sheffield) occupied the first part of the programme, the latter portion consisting of miscellaneous vocal and instrumental music. The Cantata proved a thorough success, the recitatives and airs as well as the choruses being most creditably performed. The Overture was admirably rendered by the orchestra, and the various items in the second part were also highly successful. Mr. Wm. Chapman conducted. This was the final Concert of the season.

Ipswich.—Mr. Lindley Nunn gave his grand Evening Concert on Thursday, the 22nd ult., to a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme included Weber's Quartet in B flat, effectively given by Miss Nunn and Miss A. B. Nunn (daughters of Mr. Lindley Nunn), Miss L. Nunn (his niece), and Monsieur Lasserre; and Chopin's duet "La Gaieté," in which Miss L. Nunn (violin) and Miss A. B. Nunn (piano) again acquitted themselves admirably. Miss L. Nunn, a pupil of M. Sainton, subsequently gave as a solo De Bériot's "Scène de Ballet," which was charmingly rendered. Miss A. B. Nunn, of the Conservatoire, Paris, appeared to no less advantage in Chopin's grand Pianoforte Sonata in B minor, played entirely from memory. M. Lasserre was encored for his marvellous violoncello performance of Davidoff's "Romance sans paroles," and responded by playing his own "La Fileuse." Almost equally applauded was Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, executed by Miss L. Nunn, Miss A. B. Nunn, and M. Lasserre. The solo vocalists were Miss Henrietta Nunn (also a niece of Mr. Lindley Nunn), and Miss Ethel Turner, of Ipswich. Weber's duet, "Come, be gay," highly delighted the audience. Miss H. Nunn was encored in Mozart's Aria "Batti, batti," but her happiest effort was in the ballad "She wore a wreath of roses," rapturously encored in spite of the late hour, and in part repeated. Several part-songs agreeably diversified the programme, Caldicott's "Humpty, dumpty," with which the Concert closed, being declaimed with a point and vigour irresistibly amusing and effective.

Iver, near Windsor.—The Colnbrook Choral Class gave a Concert of Sacred Music on March 31 in the Iver Church School-room, under the patronage and in the presence of the Vicar, the Rev. W. S. Ward, M.A. The choir numbered twenty voices. Selections were given from Handel, Mozart, and Kent. Miss Seaborne presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. R. Ratcliff conducted. The performance throughout was a highly satisfactory one.

Leamington.—The Musical Society, assisted by Miss Jefferson and Mr. A. L. Fryer, gave its first Concert at the Public Hall on the 9th ult., the programme consisting of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. Frank Spinney, the able Conductor, had evidently spared neither time nor pains in preparing his forces for their first appearance, and his efforts were rewarded with a performance such as has seldom been heard in Leamington. There was an efficient band of forty performers, principally from Birmingham, and a choir of 160 members, a special feature being Mr. Fryer's rendering of the tenor music. De Beriot's Sixth Concerto for violin, played by Mr. Ward, was rapturously redemanded, and Eaton Faning's part-song "The Vikings" received well-merited applause for its fine delivery.

Lee.—Mr. Burton W. Yaldwyn gave his Annual Concert on Tuesday the 20th ult., in the Small Public Hall, before an appreciative audience. Pianoforte solos were effectively rendered by Miss Isabel Ramsay and Mr. A. W. Batchelor. The vocalists (Miss A. E. Wallace, the Misses Ramsay, Mr. N. J. Ravenor, Messrs. J. J. Field, G. Rees, and B. W. Yaldwyn) were very successful, encores being awarded to Miss Wallace and Mr. Ravenor. The net proceeds were devoted to the St. Mildred's Church Organ and Chancel Decoration Funds.

Leicester.—The members of the New Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio, St. Paul, on Thursday evening, the 8th ult., at the Temperance Hall, which was attended by a numerous audience. The principal singers were Miss Maud Cornish, Miss Martha Harries, Mr. H. Guy, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The choruses were rendered in a style highly creditable to the Society. The band was full and efficient, and Mr Hancock conducted with his usual skill. The performance was received with frequent applause, Miss Harries obtaining an enthusiastic encore for her singing of "But the Lord is mindful of His own," and Mr. Guy being much applauded in "Be thou faithful unto death."

Madeley, Salop.—On Tuesday, the 6th ult., the Choral Society gave a good performance of Barnett's Ancient Mariner, followed by a miscellaneous selection, including "Nightingale Chorus" (Solomon), and Bishop's "Spirits, advance!" songs, and an instrumental Trio for violin, piano, and Mustel organ (Mr. Smart, Master Frank, and Mr. Watkiss). There was a good audience. The solos in the Cantata were taken by Mrs. Bellamy and Miss Elena Bailey, Mr. W. Anstice and Mr. Andrews (Hereford Cathedral). The choruses were well rendered. Mr. Smart (Newport) conducted.

Manchester.—A very successful Concert was given on Monday evening, the 12th ult., at the Chorlton Town Hall, in aid of the funds of the choir of St. Luke's Church, Chorlton-on-Medlock, by the members of the Swinton Musical Society, ably assisted by Miss Constance Wyld (of the Royal Academy, London), and Messrs. J. Grimshaw and J. D. Smith, of Manchester. The principal item in the programme was Haydn's Spring, which was most creditably rendered; the solo vocalists being highly efficient. Two pianoforte duets were well performed by Mrs. Pearson and Miss Knowles; and in the second part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, a song, "The little Maid of Arcadee" (Sullivan), well sung by Miss Wyld, and a glee, "Little Jack Horner" (Caldicott), were very successful. Mr. E. Rawlinson, of Swinton, ably accompanied on the piano. Great praise is due to Mr. F. H. Dale, organist, &c., of Swinton Church, for the careful training of the choir and the manner in which he conducted the performance. The Rev. J. Cater (Rector of St. Luke's Church), during an interval, took the opportunity of presenting very handsome prizes to three of the choir-boys.——A Concert in aid of the Athenæum Musical Society's library fund was given on Monday evening, the 12th ult., in the hall of the Athenæum, and, as usual, was very numerously attended. The programme contained several interesting numbers, including Spring's Message, by Niels Gade; Mendelssohn's setting of the 95th Psalm, "Come, let us sing"; and Dr. Hiles's Cantata for female voices, entitled Watchfulness, a work which perhaps presents the talents of the composer in a more striking light than anything he has previously given to the public. The Cantata mainly consists of choruses, broken, however, by narrative recitatives which relate the Parable of the Ten Virgins. The work was well sung, and, on the whole, well accompanied by an orchestra led by Mr. Otto Bernhardt. The Concert concluded with Costa's melodious Serenata The Dream.

Melbourne, Derbyshire.—The first Concert of the year was given by the Glee and Madrigal Society on Easter Tuesday evening. The first part of the programme was devoted to sacred music, and included Goss's anthem "Praise the Lord;" "Angels ever bright and fair," charmingly sung by Master Marriott; Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, "Judge me, O God;" the same composer's Hear my Prayer, the soprano solo being given with much finish by Miss Wadham; a selection from Macfarren's Joseph; and several solos; the whole of the pieces named being admirably rendered. In the second (secular) part Mr. Henry Gordon played an excellent arrangement of the Largo and Gavotte from the Orchestral Suite in D, by Bach, on the violin, and was encored in "I am a roamer" (Mendelssohn), thus showing himself equally capable as a vocalist and instrumentalist. Other vocal solos were given by Miss Wadham and Master Marriott with much success. Mrs. Wilson accompanied with skill and judgment, and Mr. Wilson, as usual, was the Conductor. Handel's Hercules, and Mendelssohn's Œdipus and Antigone, will shortly be given by this Society.

Milnthorpe, Westmoreland.—Mr. E. Cunliffe gave his third Concert this season in the Agricultural Hall, on March 31, before a large audience. The vocalists were Madame Schofield, Miss Empsall, Mr. Buckland, and Mr. Simeon Schofield. Mr. E. Cunliffe accompanied. Madame Schofield's rendering of "One morning, oh so early," "Comin' thro' the rye," and "Twickenham ferry," and Miss Empsall's singing of "Sleep, dearest, sleep," "Darby and Joan," and "Love was once a little boy," were much appreciated, and elicited warm applause and encores. Mr. Buckland and Mr. Schofield were also highly successful in all their songs, some of which were redemanded. Mr. and Mrs. Cunliffe gave a piano duet, Les Huguenots, in excellent style, and in every respect this was the best Concert Mr. Cunliffe has given this season.

Moffat.—A most successful performance of Mendelssohn's unfinished Oratorio Christus was given by the Choral Union on the 7th ult. The second part of the Concert consisted of glees and songs. The solos were rendered by Miss M. J. McHardy (soprano) and members of the Union. Mr. Robert McHardy (Edinburgh) conducted. The whole of the pieces were warmly received by a large and appreciative audience.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The first Service in this town with the "Passion Music" was given in St. Andrew's Parish Church on Good Friday evening, Haydn's setting of the Seven Last Words being the work selected. The singers consisted of the regular surpliced choir of the Church, thirty-six in number, augmented by fifty members, and the Organists' Private Amateur Choir. The music had been in careful rehearsal since Christmas, and the rendering of it exceeded all anticipations. The church was crowded, many being unable to obtain admission. Prayers were read by the Vicar, the Rev. Rowland East, M.A., and the organ accompaniments were skilfully played by the Organist, Mr. T. Albion Alderson.—Mr. T. A. Alderson's amateur choir gave an Invitation Concert in the grand salon of the Assembly Rooms on the 16th ult. The programme comprised Schumann's Pilgrimage of the Rose, and Smart's Fishermaidens, both Cantatas being admirably rendered. The choruses were sung with marked precision, the attack being in every way perfect. Mr. Alderson accompanied on the piano.

North Berwick.—The Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Bates, gave a most successful performance of Handel's Messiah on Tuesday, March 30. The solos—with the exception of those for bass voice, which were rendered by Messrs. Sanderson and Smith, of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh—were sung by members of the Society, and the Choruses were excellently rendered throughout.

Norwich.—A Special Service was held in the Cathedral on Good Friday evening, when the building was literally thronged from end to end and in every available place, with a congregation which for numbers has been rarely, if ever, equalled. It had been announced that the Service would include, as an anthem, a selection from Handel's Oratorio Messiah, which would be supported by full orchestral accompaniments. Though the novelty of such a proceeding may have been the governing cause of attraction, it is extremely probable that many by their attendance desired to express their approval of the restoration of the Oratorio to its proper place, at the same time to enter their silent but none the less emphatic protest against the lengthened disuse of the orchestra in the English Church, and the loss thereby of the many powerful and majestic effects which cannot be more worthily or appropriately employed than in divine service. In addition to the organ, at which presided for the occasion the clever Organist of Westminster Abbey, Dr. J. Frederick Bridge, the orchestra comprised six first violins, seven second violins, four violas, three violoncellos, three double basses, two flutes, two oboes, two clarionets, one bassoon, two trumpets, two saxhorns, one trombone, and drums; and it is a most gratifying and noteworthy feature that all the performers most cheerfully and gratuitously gave their services. After a short prayer, taken from the last part of the Commination Service, an exhaustive discourse was preached by the Dean of Norwich on "The rent veil," the very reverend preacher taking his text from Matthew xxvii. 20, 21. Then followed the anthem, which comprised the following pieces from The Messiah: 1, chorus, "Behold the Lamb of God;" 2, air, "He was despised" (very expressively sung by Mr. C. L. Holden); 3, chorus, "Surely He hath borne our griefs;" 4, chorus, "All we like sheep;" 5, recitative, "All they that see Him;" 6, chorus, "He trusted in God;" 7, recitative, "Thy rebuke hath broken His heart;" 8, air, "Behold and see if there be any sorrow;" 9, recitative, "He was cut off;" 10, air, "But Thou didst not leave His soul in hell;" 11, quartet, "Since by man came death;" 12, chorus, "By man came also;" 13, quartet, "For as in Adam all die; 14, chorus, "Even so in Christ;" 15, chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb;" 16, chorus, "Amen." Nos. 5, 7, 8, 9, and 10 were sung with much feeling by Mr. Henry J. Minns. The Service commenced with a very spirited performance of the Overture to The Messiah, and concluded with the andante from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the latter, however, appearing somewhat unsuitable for an outgoing voluntary on such an occasion. At the conclusion of the movement, Dr. Bridge gave with masterly effect an organ piece of appropriate character by E. Silas. Dr. Gladstone, the Organist of the Cathedral, officiated with great ability as Conductor of the musical service, a duty, under the circumstances, of much difficulty and responsibility.

Oswestry.—Mr. George Gaffe, Organist of the Parish Church, has been appointed Organist of St. Albans Cathedral in an open competition out of fifty candidates. Although his success is of course gratifying to his friends as well as to himself, his leaving Oswestry for a distant part of England will occasion much regret, and his loss will be very keenly felt by the clergy, choir, and congregation of the Parish Church. Mr. Gaffe's organ-playing has been a remarkable feature of the services at the Parish Church, and his admirable organ recitals on Sunday evenings have nearly filled the church for half an hour before the beginning of the service. The value of his help at the Oswestry New Year's Festivals, and especially at the great festival held last autumn, was fully appreciated, and the newly established School of Music in Oswestry will sustain a great loss in being deprived of his services as its Principal. We understand that it is in contemplation to present Mr. Gaffe with some substantial token of regard, as well as in recognition of the satisfactory manner in which he has discharged the duties of Organist and Choirmaster during the past six years.

Oxford.—On Tuesday, the 13th ult., the foundation stone of the City of Oxford High School for Boys was laid by His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, with appropriate ceremony, and in the presence of a large number of ladies and gentlemen connected with the City and University. The site set apart for the new school is nearly one acre in extent, and occupies a central and advantageous position in the neighbourhood of New-Inn-Hall Street. The religious service was conducted by the Bishop of Oxford; Queen's College Choir, by kind permission of the Provost and Fellows, and under the able conductorship of the College Organist, Mr. Dodds, Mus. Bac., rendering valuable assistance.

Paisley.—A Concert of the Tonic Sol-Fa Institute was given on the 7th ult., in the Abercorn Rooms. The hall was not quite so well filled by the public as the recognised high standing of the Institute would have warranted the directors in anticipating, but those who attended enjoyed a rich musical treat. The programme comprised glees, part-songs, madrigals, and choruses, selected from the works of Schumann, Sullivan, Tinley, Paxton, and other composers. The singing showed a marked improvement from that at former secular Concerts given by this Society. Encores were demanded for the "Bells of St. Michael's tower," "Hunting song," and "Merry boys, away." Mr. Miller appeared to advantage in "Love once again," and Mr. Paterson sang with taste "The boatman's song," by Blumenthal. The principal feature in the evening's programme was the rendering of "Auld Robin Gray" and other songs by Miss Agnes Fulton. Her efforts were vociferously applauded, and to an encore she responded with "Comin' thro' the rye." Mr. Wm. T. Hoeck occupied the post of accompanist, and gave two solos on one of Kirkman's iron grands, to the evident enjoyment of the audience. Mr. John A. Brown, under whose careful superintendence the Institute has reached its present state of musical efficiency, conducted.

Parkstone.—On Thursday, the 22nd ult., Mr. J. Colin Palmer gave an Evening Concert in aid of the Parkstone Schools, the vocalists being Miss Agnes Fielding, Mr. Tom Wade, Mr. Walter Barnett, Mr. Wells Lillyman, Mr. Cuff, and Mr. J. C. Palmer. The programme was a popular one, and concluded with an operetta entitled True Blue, by W. Barnett, in which Miss Agnes Fielding and Mr. Wells Lillyman gained much applause.

Peebles.—The members of the Peebles Choral Union gave a Concert of vocal and instrumental music in the Chambers Institution Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., before a large audience. Mr. Robert McHardy conducted with much efficiency. The opening piece was Romberg's Ode The Transient and the Eternal, which was well rendered, the solos being given with much firmness and expression. The remainder of the programme consisted of songs, duets, and choruses, which were all effectively given. Miss McHardy was highly successful in her solos, and the young ladies who respectively sang "My sailor lad and I," and "A little mountain lad," were also well received. The choruses were excellently rendered, and the lady who presided at the harmonium was an able accompanist. The members acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of the audience, and in a manner which reflected great credit on the training of Mr. McHardy.

Penicuik.—The Concert given by the Shottstown band on the 9th ult. proved a great success. The men were dressed in a neat new uniform, and performed several pieces in a most satisfactory manner, reflecting much credit upon themselves as well as their instructor, Mr. Mangelsdorff. The singing of Messrs. Lumsden, Cameron, and Johnston was warmly applauded, and encores were awarded to Miss Affleck and Miss Cameron. The young pianist, Crissy Mangelsdorff, acquitted himself admirably; indeed, his playing is remarkable for a child of his age, and he well deserved the hearty encore demanded of him.

Ramsgate.—Mr. Arthur E. Bunnett (the lately appointed Organist of Holy Trinity Church) gave his first Pianoforte Recital on Monday, the 12th ult., at the Granville Hall. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, and compositions by Handel, Schumann, Rubinstein, Raff, and Liszt, played by Mr. Bunnett. Miss Cowell and Mr. H. Tuddenham played a duet for piano and flute ("Soirées Musicales de Rossini"), and a Trio by Haydn for piano, flute, and violoncello was also performed. Songs were contributed by Mrs. Cope and Mr. C. Lethbridge. Mr. George Prior conducted.

Rochester.—The seventh season of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society closed on Monday, the 26th ult., with a performance of Benedict's Oratorio St. Peter. The chorus and orchestra numbered about 250, and the soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Ludwig; the leader of the orchestra being Herr Rosenthal, and the Conductors the Rev. W. H. Nutter and Rev. C. C. Corfe. The difficulties of St. Peter are of no common order, and these difficulties were not lessened by the work having to be rendered by a chorus composed entirely of amateurs, and an orchestra consisting of amateurs and members of the military bands of the Royal Engineers and Royal Marines. Taking the execution of the work as a whole, and (independent of the objectionable feature of two Conductors, which caused a marked difference in the rendering of the two parts) the performance was fully worthy of commendation. The choruses were given with great precision and attention to light and shade, and the orchestra was thoroughly efficient. The names of the soloists were a sufficient guarantee that their portion of the work would be well done. The Society is to be congratulated on the good work it is doing in the musical art by bringing such works before the public. On Saturday, the 24th ult., a grand rehearsal of the Oratorio was held, in presence of an overflowing audience, when the solos were very efficiently rendered by Miss Marian Jones, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Frank Boyle, and Mr. R. E. Miles. An irresistible encore rewarded the singing of the quartet, "O come, let us sing unto the Lord."

ROSS.—On Tuesday evening, the 13th ult., the members of the Ross Vocal Union gave a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul at the Corn Exchange. They were assisted by Miss Julia Jones, Miss Moss, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, Mr. Charlesworth, and Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe, and an efficient band, which with the choir numbered about eighty. The whole performance was most satisfactory. Of the solo parts the most successful were "Jerusalem, thou that killest" (Miss Jones), "But the Lord" (Miss Moss), "Be thou faithful" (Mr. C. W. Fredericks), "Consume them" and "O God have mercy" (Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe), and the duet, "For so hath the Lord" (Mr. Fredericks and Mr. Charlesworth).

STAMFORD.—The second and last Concert of the Stamford Choral Society for the present season was given on the 8th ult. at the Corn Exchange. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and the second portion comprised secular, vocal, and instrumental music. The professional vocalists engaged were Miss Florence Norman, Miss Juliet Brookes, and Mr. Sidney Tower. The choruses of the Hymn of Praise were rendered in a very satisfactory manner. Special mention must be made of Mr. Sidney Tower in the tenor recitative "Sing ye praise," of Miss Florence Norman and Miss Juliet Brookes in the duet "I waited for the Lord," and of Miss Norman and Mr. Sidney Tower in the soprano and tenor duet "My song shall be alway Thy mercy." In the second part of the programme the violin solo by Mr. F. B. Smythies was warmly applauded, and the vocalists were highly successful in all their solos. Miss Horner proved herself an efficient accompanist. Whilst many thanks are due to the individual performers for providing such a thoroughly good Concert, an especial meed of praise must be given to the able and indefatigable Conductor, Mr. A. G. Mitchell, who must be congratulated upon so successful an issue of his labours.

STOCKPORT.—On Thursday, the 8th ult., the Choir of the Parish Church gave an interesting Concert at the National Schools, under the management of Mr. Swain, Organist of the Church. The principal vocalists were Miss F. Hoyland and Miss Bowmont, of Manchester, and Messrs. Lewis and Smith, of Stockport. A number of glees were excellently rendered by the choristers, and very cordially received. The solos were well sung, many being enthusiastically encored. Master A. E. Collier gave two violin solos, the second being deservedly redemanded. Mr. Chas. Swain was pianist and Conductor.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES.—On Tuesday, the 22nd ult., a Concert was given at the North Terrace School-room, by the Wesleyan Choral Union. The performance consisted of Stainer's sacred Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, and a miscellaneous selection, the principal vocalists being Mrs. Humble, Mr. A. J. Searl, and Mr. F. Sanderson. Mr. Knaggs and Mr. W. R. French acted as accompanists. Miss Florrie Barnby was solo pianist, and Mr. Barnby conducted. The solos and choruses were well sustained, and the performance was a great success.

STOW-ON-THE-WOLD.—The Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater on March 30, the soloists being Miss Dickenson, Mrs. Eaton-Glover, Miss H. White, Mr. A. L. Fryer, and Mr. A. G. Crane. The second part of the programme consisted of a selection of songs by Mrs. Dening, Miss White, Miss Mayne, Mr. A. L. Fryer, and Mr. A. G. Crane, all of which were very successful. Mr. Warner and Mr. G. Gillman presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively, and Mr. Horsley, of Oxford, conducted.

TAVISTOCK.—A Concert in aid of the National Schools was given on March 31. The soloists were Mrs. Hill, Miss Neat, Mr. C. J. Vincent (Organist of the Parish Church), Mr. F. Martin, and Mr. W. H. Martin. Mr. Maxwell, of Exeter, gave some recitations. The school choir sang some part-songs in an excellent manner, showing evidence of good training. Mr. C. Loam, Organist of Bridgetown Church, Totnes, conducted very ably. The pianists were Mr. C. Loam, Mrs. Neat, and Mr. G. Loam. There was a large audience.

TETBURY.—A very successful Concert was given by Mr. W. E. Bartlett (who is leaving Tetbury to undertake the duties of Organist and Choirmaster of Redhill, Surrey) on Tuesday, the 13th ult. The vocalists were Miss Eva Neate, Miss Edith Taylor, R.A.M., Messrs. Twinning, and C. Gilding. Mr. Bartlett presided at the pianoforte, and played two solos with much skill, and was warmly applauded. The singing of Miss Eva Neate and Miss Taylor was greatly enjoyed, and both were encored in their songs. The Concert was well attended by a fashionable audience.

TOTTENHAM.—On Thursday evening, the 15th ult., a second Concert on behalf of the Organ Fund was given at the High Cross Congregational Church, when Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion and a miscellaneous selection were performed, under the conductorship of Mr. Kale. Mr. John E. West was the accompanist, and also gave a very effective organ solo and a composition of his own on the pianoforte during the evening. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Oosterveen, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Weager, Mr. Langman, and Mr. Coulson. The Concert proved a great success.

WALTHAM ABBEY.—A Concert was given on the 12th ult. in the Boys' School-room, in aid of the Wesleyan Chapel Building Fund. The programme, which was miscellaneous, consisted of selections from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Stainer, Barnby, &c. The whole performance was generally appreciated, some of the songs being received with great applause. The vocalists were Mrs. Chamberlain, Misses Morgan, Hicks, and Lynch; Messrs. Chamberlain, J. W. and W. Turnham, and Turner. Mr. H. Atkinson accompanied throughout.

WATLINGTON.—The Choir and Organist of St. Leonard's Church gave a selection of sacred and appropriate music on the afternoon of Good Friday in the Church, which comprised for the choir Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, Gounod's "Jesu, Word of God incarnate," Reynolds's "My God, why hast Thou forsaken me," &c.; and solos on the organ, which were performed by the Organist, Mr. Fisher Clark, in a thoroughly artistic manner. The vocal pieces were so successfully rendered as to evidence the care with which they had been prepared. The soprano solos by Miss Rose Raymond were excellently sung. Mr. S. Cope (Conductor of the Philharmonic Society) ably directed. The "Hallelujah" chorus (Messiah) was sung on Easter Sunday as an anthem, Tallis's festival responses being used.——The Watlington Philharmonic Society gave a Concert on the 13th ult., in the Lecture Hall. The Society had the valuable assistance of Mr. Ives, of Thame, and of the violins of the Misses Watts, aged twelve and fourteen respectively. The Concert opened with the Overture to Tancredi, played by the Misses Watts and Mr. Ives (violins), the Misses Boyton (piano), and Mr. Cope (cornet-à-piston), which was highly successful, as indeed were all the pieces in which these juvenile artists were engaged during the evening. Vocal solos were rendered by Mrs. R. Spyer, Miss Raymond, Messrs. S. Cope and Nicholson; and the part-songs, "The better land" and "The sea-king," were given by the choir of the Society under Mr. Cope's conductorship with a light and shade that left little to be desired. A vote of thanks to the Conductor and the Misses Watts was proposed by the Rev. G. J. Pellew, and seconded by Mr. Boyton.

WINDSOR.—Messrs. Christian and Mellor's Concert, given at the Albert Institute on the 4th ult., was well attended. The artists were Madame Terese Liebe, Mr. Theodore Liebe, and Mr. Charles Lawrence, Mus. Bac., Oxon., instrumentalists; and Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Margaret Hancock, &c., vocalists.——Mr. W. T. Briggs gave a Concert at the same hall on the 12th ult., assisted by Miss A. Larkcom, Madame Poole, Mr. Harper Kearton, &c. The programme was excellent, but the Concert was scarcely as well attended as it deserved to be.

WITHAM.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their fourth Annual Concert on Thursday, the 1st ult., at the Public Hall, which was crowded in every part. The first part of the programme comprised selections from Handel's Messiah, with orchestral accompaniments, and the second was miscellaneous, a conspicuous feature being the violin performance of Master Cansdale, which, considering that he is only twelve years of age, was highly creditable. The performers numbered sixty-two and were arranged on a specially constructed platform. Miss Cansdale presided at the harmonium through the first part, and at the piano in the second, with the exception of the accompaniments to two songs. The Concert was a decided success. Great credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. W. D. Cansdale, who devotes so much time, care, and attention, not only to the general practice but to all matters of detail. As a proof of the appreciation of his labours, the choir at their last practice previous to the Concert presented him with a valuable fourteen-day marble timepiece, and his daughter with an album.

WOKINGHAM.—Mr. T. S. Brown gave his Annual Concert in the Town Hall on the 21st ult. "The sea hath its pearls" (Pinsuti), "I Naviganti" (Randegger), and a duet, "The Venetian boat song" (Blumenthal), were among the gems of the evening. Miss Jessie Royd, in "Twickenham ferry," and a new song "It happened," by Pontet, was enthusiastically encored; and Miss M. Hancock received a similar compliment in "The old, old story" (Blumenthal) and "The king of my heart is coming." Messrs. Christian and Mellor were the other vocalists; Mr. Betty was the solo cornet, and Mr. R. M. Brown conducted. The Concert was a most successful one.

WORCESTER.—The third and last of the series of Concerts for the season given by Mr. Spark, which have afforded so much pleasure to the inhabitants, took place at the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., when a large, appreciative, and discriminating audience assembled. The programme was as diversified as it was attractive; and, judging by the enthusiasm that prevailed throughout the Concert, both the selection and the performance were in every way acceptable. Miss Ellen Lamb, a soprano from the London Concerts, and Madame Enriquez achieved a well-merited success, as did also Mr. Hollins and Signor Ghilberti. Dr. Spark, the eminent Organist of the Leeds Town Hall, played three solos on the new organ recently erected in the Music Hall. His performance was in every respect a most finished and perfect one, and displayed to great advantage the capabilities of the new instrument, which is undoubtedly a great acquisition to the city. Mr. Charles Davieson, as accompanist, left but little to be desired.

WORTHING.—A large audience assembled at the performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus at Montague Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 7th ult. The Society was fortunate in securing the services of such old favourites as Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. John Bridson, all of whom were thoroughly efficient, although Miss Jones was unfortunately suffering from hoarseness. The band comprised some of the most eminent instrumentalists of the day, and probably never before has so excellent an orchestra been heard in Worthing. The majority of the choruses were sung with good effect, and, taken as a whole, the Concert was a genuine success.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. William Bolton, Organist and Choirmaster to Clapton Wesleyan Chapel.—Miss Cooper to Christ Church, Highbury.—Mr. James Hodges to St. Stephen's Church, Upper Richmond Road, Wandsworth.—Mr. W. G. Wood, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Woburn Square, W.C.—Mr. E. Thatcher, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate.—Mr. H. Walmsley Little, Mus. Bac., A.R.A. Mus., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill, S.E.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.—Mr. John F. Probert (Tenor) to Christ Church, Oxford.

SYDNEY SMITH'S

Pianoforte Method.

This unrivalled work is now firmly established as the Pianoforte Instruction-Book in nearly all the principal educational establishments in Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, the United States of America, India, Australia, New Zealand, &c. It is supplied direct by the Publishers, or may be had of any Musicseller in the world,

64 PAGES, FULL MUSIC SIZE. PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

"There are features in this work of uncommon merit, but we shall say enough if we recommend it unreservedly to all who seek a manual of instruction, well arranged, intelligible, and effective."—Musical World, April 23.

"Mr. Sydney Smith's Method is new, not alone in name, but in fact, and the research, care, and time bestowed upon it have resulted in the production of the best, because simplest and clearest, Instruction-Book for the Piano. While every care has been taken to cull all that was useful from the old régime, much that is altogether modern and thoroughly practical is here to be met with for the first time. In particular, it seems to have been the author's purpose to lead the student by gentle degrees, and to insure that one thing shall be properly acquired before another is attempted."—The Queen, April 30.

"The aim of the author seems to have been to supply as much information in as few words as possible, while aiding and directing the self-intelligence of the learner, and he certainly has succeeded admirably."—Examiner, April 30.

"Care is taken to interest the learner from the outset, and for this reason, as well as others, the 'Method' is eminently valuable."—Daily Telegraph.

TECHNICAL GUIDE

TO

ON THE PIANOFORTE.

Price Three Shillings.

"We quite agree with the author of this book that a very decided line should be drawn between pianoforte 'studies' and pianoforte 'exercises;' for it is only by a vigorous practice of mere finger-work that true mechanism can be obtained; and to hope to play any of the studies of the great masters, therefore, before the hand has been properly trained by 'exercise,' is manifestly absurd, for it is beginning at the wrong end. Mr. Sloper truly observes, 'No one should attempt Moscheles's Chromatic Study (No. 3 of Book I.) who has not thoroughly mastered the simple chromatic scale, nor, to take an easier instance, hope, by practising Heller's First Study, Op. 46, to obtain the evenness of touch and clearness of articulation which only a steadfast adherence to five-finger exercises can give.' To those who believe in the truth of these remarks the book before us will prove of the utmost value. The author modestly says, 'I shall be glad and flattered if it meets with the approbation of my professional brethren,' and we can scarcely doubt that his hope will be realised; for although pianists do not always agree as to the method of fingering certain passages, the broad principles are sufficiently recognised, and it is good that pupils, in the absence of the master, should have so systematic a work to refer to. We are glad to find that Mr. Sloper recommends the practice of what may be termed the 'harmonic' as well as the 'melodic' minor scale."—Musical Times.

THE ONLY COMPLETE EDITION

CONTAINING BOOKS 7 and 8.

"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this or, indeed, at any season of the year."—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News.

MUSIC OF THE BIBLE

WITH AN ACCOUNT OF THE

DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS FROM ANCIENT TYPES BY

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.

"The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has he accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Musical Times.

LETTERS FROM BAYREUTH

DESCRIPTIVE AND CRITICAL OF

WAGNER'S

DER RING DES NIBELUNGEN

Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Bennett is well-known to English musicians as one of our ablest critics. A musician himself, he adds to remarkable insight and critical judgment—intensified by long experience—the gift of a fine, lucid, and nervous English style. . . . As a permanent record of these famous performances, Mr. Bennett's little book cannot be too highly recommended, and those amateurs who wish to have a general idea of Wagner's theories will find them described in language less enthusiastic certainly than in the letters of the composer's avowed disciples, but without prejudice, and above all without a trace of intention to ridicule. . . . In the appendix are interesting sketches of Nuremberg and Salzburg, and an account of a visit to the graves of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert."—Manchester Examiner.

"We find so much which we can cordially indorse that we have great pleasure in recommending the little volume as an interesting record of the important events which it describes."—Academy.

STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical com position, has great interest on account of its very remarkable histor The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impressic made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under suc pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as t its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which fi fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned me and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearanc and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discover the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, th strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of th various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible inform tion has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hither but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appr priate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" publishe by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstakin investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the mo logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinar story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and or which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

PATENT RISING MUSIC-STOOL.

(THE "HALLÉ.")

THIS Stool is an improvement beyond all others, and has been recommended by Professors and the Music Trade generally. Its mechanical appliance is simple, noiseless, and durable; enables the sitter of any age to raise or lower the elevation with one hand, without quitting the seat, and from its extreme steadiness and comfort for Pianoforte players is testified by Charles Hallé, Esq., to be "the most useful stool for public and private use," and is used by him in his public performances. The patronage thus given has greatly increased the demand, and justified a revision of its original charge. It can now be obtained at a considerable reduction in Walnut, Rosewood, or Mahogany, covered in any coloured Leather, Satin, Velvet, or other fancy material.

Price Lists and Illustrations free on application to us or to any Musicseller, through whom these Stools and other articles of Music Furniture can be obtained.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
JUNE 1, 1880.

SIR JOHN GOSS.

RIPE in years, and surrounded by respect and honour, John Goss died on Monday, the 10th ult. The hand of death had not been laid upon him without warning. For some considerable time his higher faculties had shown symptoms of gradual decline, and his state of health had been a constantly increasing source of solicitude to those near to him; but, as we all know, at such a time the love of those most closely bound to the slowly receding form seems to grow warmer and expand as it is the more needed and the more severely taxed. For those who are now saddened by his loss our sympathy is more demanded than if his removal had been more sudden. We must not look upon John Goss as one of those lucky human beings on whom special gifts are bestowed as if by a capricious fate or mere chance. His history undoubtedly adds one more instance to the long list of those in whom genius was hereditary. John Jeremiah Goss, uncle of Sir John Goss who was born in 1770, achieved a high reputation as a vocalist. He was a vicar-choral of St. Paul's, a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, and a gentleman of the Chapel Royal. Various anecdotes tend to prove that he used his rich and sweet alto voice with the skill of a genuine artist. He died in 1817, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Joseph Goss, the father of John Goss, was organist of Fareham, Hants. In that neighbourhood there still lingers a tradition of his natural ability, and it is probable he would have left his mark had he been placed in a more favourable sphere of labour. On December 27, 1800, his son John was born in Fareham, but, fortunately for him, he was elected a chorister of the Chapel Royal when eleven years of age. He thus had an early association with that literature of Church music which was afterwards to be enriched so nobly from his own pen. The education of chorister-boys in those days, even within the shadows of the palace of St. James, was of a most happy-go-lucky description. On two days in each week a parochial schoolmaster (for some time the schoolmaster of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields) attended the house in Adelphi Terrace, where the boys lived, and gave them an hour and a half's instruction. These days were appropriately termed "slate days," because the rudiments of arithmetic occupied the greater part of the time. This constituted for a considerable period the only training in literis humanioribus of the young gentlemen of His Majesty's Chapel Royal. Nor does it seem that musical instruction, outside the usual routine work of learning necessary anthems and canticles, was more liberally bestowed, for on one occasion the youngster John Goss bought out of his hardly saved pocket-money a copy of a set of Handel's organ concertos (Walsh's Pianoforte Edition). Whilst walking across the school-room one day with the book under his arm, he met his music-master (whose name had better not be here given). The master accosted him, "What have you under your arm?" "If you please, sir," said little Goss, trembling, "it's only Handel's organ concertos, and I thought I should like to learn to play them." "Oh! only Handel's concertos," replied the master; "and pray, sir, did you come here to learn to play or to sing?" "To sing, sir," said Goss, utterly discomforted. The master then seized the book, and crowned his argument by hitting the boy on the head with it. Poor Goss never again saw his beloved book!* But his true genius successfully struggled against such adverse conditions and surroundings, and he managed to seek and find for himself the opportunities for study which others denied him. That the results were good is proved by a manuscript sonnet still preserved, dated July 18, 1816, "In a deep sequestered grove," composed at Poole, in Dorset. It is evidently the work of a young and unpractised hand, but it is rich in promise, and must doubtless have been an interesting memento to its author, or he would not have allowed the copy to remain amongst the few unpublished autographs which survive him. About this time he had certainly a leaning towards the stage, for a "Negro Song," for three voices, and scored for a small band (strings, flutes, oboes, clarionets, and two horns), is dated 1819, and probably formed a contribution to some drama. Later still, in 1827, he most likely composed the music to the play, "The Serjeant's Wife," although the overture only exists in his own handwriting, and there is reason to believe his name was never publicly attached to the work. He was now organist of the new church, St. Luke, Chelsea, to which post he had been appointed after a competition on December 24, 1824. In the previous year (1823) his diary records that he had written a canon, 4 in 2, "Who can tell how oft," and also a canon, 6 in 3, "I will always give thanks," and four glees, "What is life?" (three voices), "Sweet Rose" (four voices), "Unless with my Amanda," and "O Summer," and an anthem, "Forsake me not," still in manuscript. In the same year in which he was appointed organist at Chelsea he wrote a canon, 4 in 2, to the words "Cantate Domine" (see "Harmonicon," vol. ii., p. 228). He soon, however, tried his hand at higher productions, for in 1825 an "Overture in F minor" was rehearsed by the Philharmonic Society, and eventually (in 1827) performed at one of their concerts with so much success that it was again given to the public at the British Concerts in 1835. Goss was evidently at this period of his life devoting much of his attention to orchestral writing, for in the same year in which his Overture in F minor was performed by the Philharmonic Society he composed an Overture in E flat. Of the two, that in F minor is decidedly the better; but both are full of graceful phrases, sometimes skilfully handled, although it is probable that neither of them would satisfy the cravings of our modern advanced school. They must have made a very good impression at the time, because a few years later the Philharmonic Society gave Goss every inducement to write more orchestral music, as the following letter, dated January 9, 1833, testifies:—

* The writer would not have ventured to tell this story at such a time had he not heard it from Sir John Goss' own lips.

Sir,—Agreeably to a resolution passed at a General Meeting of the Philharmonic Society, I am instructed to offer you a third portion of one hundred guineas, namely, the sum of thirty-five pounds, for an instrumental composition which shall be the property of the Society for two years from the time of its delivery, after which the copyright shall revert to you, the Society reserving to themselves the privilege of performing it at all times, and with the understanding that you shall be allowed to publish any arrangement of it as soon as you may think proper after its first performance at their Concert.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, W. WATTS, Secretary.

This liberal and certainly complimentary proposal does credit to the Philharmonic Society at that time, but it does not appear to have had the desired effect of drawing Goss' talents into the channel of instrumental music. It is more than probable that he already began to feel that his real strength would show itself more as a writer of vocal works. The success of his glee "There is beauty on the mountain," which was composed in the same year as the F minor Overture (1825), must have been a strong confirmation of his views on this subject, for it certainly ranks in the first class of compositions of this style—a remark which he himself would have not ventured to make with regard to his overtures. But the usual routine of teaching, which was the more compulsory, as he was surrounded by young children (he had married Miss New when only twenty-one years of age, who now survives him), limited very much the number of works he turned out. His diary records that a "Requiem," inscribed to the memory of the Duke of York, was composed in 1827; another "Requiem" in 1829, in honour of Shield, as also "Hallelujah," a canon for equal voices; and in 1833 the glees "Fanny of the Dale," "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun," and "The Holiday Gown." How much he owed to the influence of Attwood can only be fully appreciated when we consider the merits of the anthem, "Have mercy upon me," which gained the "Gresham Prize" in 1833 (and which he dedicated to his master, Attwood), placed side by side with those produced when this master's instruction had begun to bear fruit. Intimate friends of Goss know how much he cherished every memorial of his intercourse with that talented musician; indeed he never talked about him without considerable emotion. All those fine anthems, on which the lasting fame of Goss will stand, were composed after his appointment to the Organistship of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1838, on the death of Attwood. But we are again led to regret that Goss' active work as a teacher (especially of harmony, on which he wrote a well-known treatise in 1833)* should have placed such obstacles in his career as a composer. In 1842 he wrote the anthem "Blessed is the man," but after this no sacred composition of any importance seemed to have come from his pen until the year 1852, when at the request of Dean Milman he composed the plaintive and beautiful Dirge, and that noble anthem, "If we believe that Jesus died," for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. The writer of this notice well remembers the scene when the work was rehearsed by a large and fine choir in the music-room, Store Street. When the last few bars pianissimo had died away, there was a profound silence for some time, so deeply had the hearts of all been touched by its truly devotional spirit. Then there gradually arose on all sides the warmest congratulation to the composer, it could hardly be termed applause, for it was something much more genuine and respectful.

The unproductiveness of Goss' genius between the years 1842 and 1852 has just been alluded to. If it be true, as was currently reported at the time, that this was partly owing to the careless and unkind criticisms passed by some members of his own choir on the anthem composed in 1842 ("Blessed is the man"), he must once more have been attracted towards the composition of Church music by the splendid reception of "If we believe," ten years later; for, from this date (1852), there appeared from time to time numerous anthems of various dimensions though of invariable excellence. "Praise the Lord, O my soul," which must share with "If we believe" the place of honour as one of Goss' most admirable productions, was composed in 1854 for the Bi-centenary Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, on which occasion (unless the writer's memory deceives him) it was performed with orchestral accompaniments. His appointment to the post of composer to Her Majesty, in 1856, gave further impetus to his labours. "Christ our Passover," and "Behold I bring you glad tidings," especially written for THE MUSICAL TIMES, were issued in 1857, and several anthems of less importance in the next three years. In 1861 he composed "The Wilderness"; and in 1863 added three splendid contributions to Church music, namely, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is," "Stand up and bless the Lord your God," and "Lift up thine eyes and behold." His powers were now at their highest point of strength, his long experience giving special charm to the "part-writing" of his vocal compositions. In 1865, "Brother, thou art gone before us," was set to music at the request of Dean Milman, the author of the beautiful words, and sung at the Sons of the Clergy Festival. "Come, and let us return," and "O give thanks," appeared in 1866; and in 1869, "O Saviour of the world," of which last it seems not too much to say that, considering its modest pretensions, it is the most natural, purely written, and impressive anthem in the whole range of musical literature. For depth of expression it has been not inaptly compared to the last vocal production of Mozart, the motett, "Ave verum corpus."

* He was one of the Professors of Harmony at the Royal Academy of Music.

Soon after this time it was evident that the physical strength of Goss was, though very gradually, very certainly becoming reduced; and it was felt by all his friends, of whom none were more attached to him than the members of the Chapter, that he was hardly capable of grappling with that thorough reconstruction of the choral foundation which public opinion had long demanded, and which enlarged pecuniary resources and an active and interested Chapter had now rendered perfectly feasible. When the Queen returned public thanks in St. Paul's for the providential escape of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales almost from the very jaws of death, the Te Deum of thanksgiving, and the anthem "The Lord is my strength," were composed for the occasion by Goss, who then retired from the duties of Organist, and soon afterwards, to the satisfaction of the whole musical profession, received the honour of knighthood from Her Majesty.

Further well-deserved recognition of his abilities awaited him. In the summer term of 1876, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, the old man might have been seen leaning on the arm of Arthur Sullivan in the Senate House of the University of Cambridge, called to receive, at the same time as his young and distinguished pupil, the degree of Mus. Doc., honoris causâ. His visits to the Cathedral, in which so much of his life had been passed, now became less and less frequent, although he never lost an opportunity of encouraging, by words of praise or advice, those who were trying hard to improve the musical services of his loved church. He was urged to set the Benedictus to music, so that his Te Deum might be used as portion of a Service. This he did; and it is probable that his last look at St. Paul's was taken after he had been listening to a splendid rendering of this his last work by the fine choir of the Cathedral.

As an organist it is difficult to pass an opinion on Goss. The organs of his youth were very different instruments to those of our time, and if he were not a brilliant performer from a modern point of view, it is equally certain that many of our young organists would be utterly unable to produce the fine effects which Goss produced on an organ having two octaves of very clumsy pedals, a gamut-G swell, a 16-ft. (CCC) great organ manual, and two or three unruly composition-pedals. He always accompanied the voices (especially when soli) with thoroughly good taste, and his extempore voluntaries were sometimes models of grace and sweetness.

As a teacher Goss held a very high place. He was painstaking and careful with his pupils to an extent rarely found in those on whom nature has bestowed genius, and a large number of musicians holding positions of eminence feel that they owe to him a lasting debt of gratitude. His talents in this direction seem to be inherited by his only surviving son, Mr. Walter Goss, who is widely known as a most successful teacher. It may not be out of place to mention here that Lucy Goss, a daughter of Mr. Walter Goss, is now a scholar of the National Training School of Music, and, though young, already gives the fairest promise of becoming an eminent pianiste.

As a man Goss commanded universal respect. The chief features of his character were humility, genuine religious feeling, and a strong love of home and home-ties. So deep-seated was his humility that it produced a sort of shyness in his manner, which partially unfitted him for the rougher duties of public life. The discipline and efficiency of the Cathedral Choir reached a very low standard during the later portion of his career. But, although Goss was not altogether the man to cope with those self-willed musicians who were on the staff, he must not be solely blamed for the unsatisfactory state of the Cathedral Choir. The fact is, he had for a considerable period to deal with a Chapter which, taken as a body, had neither the power nor wish to face the unpleasant duty of becoming reformers. His hearty interest in all the improvements which he lived to witness in the reorganisation of the choral staff by the present Dean and Chapter, and the sincere pleasure which the now beautiful musical services gave him, prove beyond doubt that, had his lot been cast in better days, Goss would have been second to no one in his efforts to raise the musical credit of St. Paul's to its proper level. Probably no musician ever had fewer hostile detractors than Goss. This was partly due to his natural amiability, but also partly due to the fact that he often shunned and avoided those unpleasant calls of duty in which, to take definite action, means, to make a personal enemy. If we admire or envy him in this respect, we must not the less give honour to those who accept trusts and perform public duties at all hazards. That Goss was a man of religious life was patent to all who came in contact with him, but an appeal to the general effect of his sacred compositions offers public proof of the fact. It is not less true in music than in other arts, that the artist writes his character in his works. In uncouth modulations and combinations can be traced the man who wishes to be thought original; in over-wrought tone-colouring the bad taste of a man who, had he been trusted with a paint-brush instead of a pen, would have revelled in violent contrasts and in the grotesque; in pedantries and conventional clever tricks stands out the man who is anxious to be thought learned, and values artifice more than art. A careful study and familiar knowledge of the sacred compositions of Goss leaves a very definite feeling that their author was a man of refined thought, religious in life, possessing a keen appreciation of the resources of his art tempered by a firm resolution to use them only in a legitimate manner. There is that gentleness and repose about them which eminently characterised the man himself. His disposition was tender and sweet; an unkindness or rough word did not rouse, it wounded him. He treated all others with consideration and goodness, and seemed hurt when he had occasion to realise the fact that others did not always treat him in the same way. He loved quietness, and valued the affection of others. He has now reached the haven where life's short and cruel storms can no more threaten him. For him we feel that the oft-chanted prayer "May he rest in peace" is hardly needful; we can say, in faith and loving remembrance, "He is in peace."

HECTOR BERLIOZ AND HIS CRITICS.

By Fr. Niecks.

ALTHOUGH Berlioz commenced his career as a composer as early as in the third decade of this century, although his concerts along with those of Liszt could be pronounced in 1837 by Heine the most remarkable phenomena of the Parisian season, although his travels in Germany (1842-43, 1845, &c.), in Russia (1847 and 1867), and his sojourns in London (1848 and 1851), made him known to almost the whole of civilised Europe, although lastly—and this is not the least important consideration—more than ten years have elapsed since his death (March 9, 1869), yet it is still an open question what the ultimate fate of his compositions and the position of his name in the temple of fame will be. At this time of day no one denies Berlioz's genius; if nothing else, at least the originality of his instrumentation is admitted; but opinions differ widely as to whether the unpopularity of his compositions is to be attributed to æsthetical shortcomings in them or to the sloth, incapacity, and narrow-mindedness of the public, musical conductors, and executants. Besides those who take sides for or against Berlioz's music, there are others that maintain a state of neutrality. Seeing the insufficiency of the material at our disposal for forming a judgment, it must be confessed that those are the wisest and most honest people who hesitate to decide anything in this matter. For let it be remembered that performances of Berlioz's works are of very rare occurrence, and, as Schumann truly remarks, Berlioz's music must be heard; the sight of the scores is not sufficient, nor can arrangements render it adequately. Moreover, his scores are not at all, or not readily, or only at considerable expense, to be had, and only a few arrangements exist of them.

France, which neglected and even ridiculed her greatest musical genius during his lifetime, has undergone a conversion. But this conversion is of recent date—the festival in honour of Berlioz at the Paris Opera House, March 22, 1870, may be taken to be the first symptom—and whether it is a passing whim or a lasting passion, time must show. Perhaps I ought to have said Paris instead of France, for there at least the conductors Pasdeloup and Colonne now vie with each other in the production of Berlioz's compositions. It was in Germany that the composer first found a fuller recognition of his worth, and it is in Germany that at the present time most attention is paid to his works. Still this attention is but a relatively slight one if we compare it with that paid to other composers. In scanning the lists, to be found in German musical papers, of performances of new and interesting compositions we meet occasionally here and there with the name of Berlioz, not only, however, more rarely than the names of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, Raff, &c., but even more rarely than the name of Liszt, who, like Berlioz, excluded on principle from the programmes of some of the most important concert institutions, certainly cannot, as a composer of symphonic and choral works, be called a popular master. The only place where Berlioz ranks with the chief of the worshipped gods is Sondershausen, the small capital of the small principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen. On the programmes of twenty-eight concerts given there in 1879 the name of Berlioz appeared seven times, that is only three times less than that of Beethoven, as often as that of Schumann, and oftener than either that of Mozart or Mendelssohn. Also the Deutscher Musikverein (Society of German Musicians) does not omit to pay its tribute of esteem to the great Frenchman. At the music festivals connected with their meetings the Society, which has existed since 1859, brought to a hearing his "Requiem" twice, his "Symphonie fantastique" likewise twice, his "Roméo et Juliette" once, and, besides these larger works, also some smaller compositions. The revival of "Benvenuto Cellini," which, thanks to the energy and enthusiasm of Hans von Bülow, was successfully put on the stage in Hanover, is an event that deserves special mention, for performances of Berlioz's dramatic works have been even more rare than those of his other works; in fact, there have been hardly any at all, and it would not take long to register them. Hans von Bülow's resignation of his post as conductor will probably disappoint the expectations of the composer's admirers, who were looking forward to the promised production of "Béatrice et Bénédict." Generally, however, as I have already said, the performances of Berlioz's works in Germany are in no proportion to those of the works of other composers. Next to Germany and France, Belgium seems to be most mindful of Berlioz. From some other countries, those beyond the Atlantic not excepted, we hear at least now and then of a performance of one or the other work. This statement, however, does scanty justice to the United States, where the Frenchman's music has been hospitably received by many musicians and amateurs. In England the name of Berlioz was till lately almost solely to be met with as the adapter for the orchestra of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," but the programmes of this season show that a change is in progress. Already performed, or promised to be performed, are "La Damnation de Faust" in Manchester and London, under Hallé; selections from "Roméo et Juliette" and "La Damnation de Faust" at the Crystal Palace, under Manns; "Harold en Italie" at Ganz's Saturday Concerts, and the "Carnaval Romain" at the Festival Concerts under Richter.

From these cursory notes it may be gathered what vote the musical world has given up to this time on the question regarding Berlioz's music. With this inarticulate opinion of the mass, however, we will not rest satisfied, but inquire farther after the articulate opinions of individuals. Next, then, we shall have to pass in review some of the most noteworthy criticisms of men of note and authority.

According to Fétis, Berlioz lacked melodic and harmonic thoughts, despised rules and study—in short, was a wretched bungler and a dauber of monsters. Lobe, on the other hand, big with admiration and rage, after hearing the composer's "Francs-Juges" and reading the critic's strictures, flames up in transcendent enthusiasm. Is he formless, Lobe exclaims, who creates new forms for new thoughts? Are not in this overture more rules observed than we have known hitherto? Indeed, could the great beauties contained therein be the work of chance? Here are novel and wonderful harmonic progressions that move the soul, a spirit-language of the instruments that elevates and astonishes us, grand pregnant periods, striking contrasts, &c., &c. Another German, W. R. Griepenkerl, took up the cause of Berlioz with great zeal, and in a brochure, "Ritter Berlioz in Braunschweig" (1843), endeavoured to expound and defend the composer's tendencies. But the stoutest and most influential supporter, active in word and deed, was Lizst; in this case, as in so many, the first to welcome genius. His arrangements of works of Berlioz for the pianoforte, the performances got up at Weimar in 1852, at his instigation, of the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," which had been unsuccessful in Paris in 1838, and of other compositions—to mention only a few services—are a clear testimony of the estimation in which he held his friend and brother artist. We now come to a criticism which in potency, considering its author, kind, and manner, stands unequalled, and very likely will for ever remain unequalled in the history of the critical art. "Beethoven spento non c' era che Berlioz che potesse farlo rivivere." Or freely translated into English, "Beethoven being dead only Berlioz could replace him." Thus begins Paganini a note which, inclosing a cheque for 20,000 francs, he sent in 1838 to Berlioz. The great violinist had been moved to this act of princely generosity by what he heard at the composer's concert which had taken place the preceding night. The disposition of Mendelssohn was of a very different nature. Although always friendly in his intercourse with the French composer and ready to assist him, he abhorred his music, if not the man, from the bottom of his soul. How unequivocal the account of the unnamed French musician in one of his letters from Rome!* How equally unequivocal the following words from a letter of his to Hiller! "The other day I saw Berlioz's Symphony, arranged by Liszt, and played it through, and once more could not imagine how you can see anything in it. I cannot conceive anything more insipid, wearisome, and Philistine, for, with all his endeavours to go stark mad, he never once succeeds" (February 26, 1835). Hiller evidently did find something in it. His enthusiasm, no doubt, has considerably cooled down since then, but although he characterised in more recent times his friend Berlioz's symphonies as "ultra-romantic," he did not cease to speak of him as a composer of genius.

The most elaborate critique which Schumann ever wrote is that on Berlioz's "Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste" ("Symphonie fantastique"). This examination of the work under all the aspects a work of art can be examined is conceived in a most friendly spirit—Schumann stretches out as it were a welcoming hand to the Frenchman, readily and warmly recognising his merits and defending or excusing his deviations from the old forms and the utilisation of new means. But the critique is far from being an indiscriminate eulogy. Although Schumann praises those parts of the work in which originality manifests itself in tenderness and beauty, he censures the wild and bizarre; although he points out the wealth of melody and harmony, the character and intensity of the former, and the simplicity, pithiness, and compactness of the latter, he does not pass over in silence that the harmony is, in his opinion, at times flat, vulgar, vague, forced, distorted, cacophonous, and that the modulations betray here and there the young, unskilled composer of eighteen "who does not trouble himself much about left and right, but marches straight to the main point." Schumann, however, is wrong in saying that Berlioz composed the symphony at the age of eighteen, nor was it performed, as he states in another part of the critique, at the Conservatoire in 1820. Berlioz did not arrive in Paris till 1822, and then he had to study music more seriously than he had as yet done, and, above all, had to fall madly in love before he could write the "Symphonie fantastique." In fact, it was heard for the first time in 1830, at a concert of the composer's. In 1836, a year after the above-mentioned critique was written, Schumann wrote a short notice on the "Francs-Juges." He does not enter on an analysis of the overture; still two expressions in his general remarks are worth noting. Comparing the styles of Auber and Berlioz, he describes that of the former as "feather-light Scribish," that of the latter as "uncouth Polyphemish." The notice concludes with the statement that there is something of genius in this Frenchman. The third and last of Schumann's discussions on Berlioz in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik appeared in 1839, and has for its subject the overture "Waverley." I shall confine myself to quoting a short passage from it. "The whole exercises over me an irresistible charm in spite of the many offensive things and the peculiarities to which the German ear is not accustomed. Berlioz has shown himself different in every work, and has ventured in each on a different domain; one does not know whether one must call him a genius or a musical adventurer; he shines like a flash of lightning, but he also leaves behind him a stench of sulphur; utters grand sentences and truths, and soon after lapses into tyro-like stammering." At the end of the first of these criticisms Schumann expresses the hope that Berlioz may more and more moderate the eccentricity of his tendency, "The frantic Bacchant, the terror of the Philistines, to them a shaggy monster," however, disappointed the critic's expectations. "Years make one more severe," Schumann wrote to Ambros, "in the later works of Berlioz there occur things which no one should be guilty of at the age of forty." The tone of displeasure noticeable in these words has nothing surprising in it, for we may easily gather from Schumann's compositions as well as from his criticisms and letters that in the course of time he modified his art principles considerably. Both artists moved onward, but in different directions, and the chasm between them became wider and wider. Was the remark which Schumann made to Berlioz, after a performance of the "Offertorium" from the "Requiem" (at Leipzig in 1843), a sincere enthusiastic expression of admiration or a compromise between good-natured politeness and love of truth? I must confess I am at a loss what to think. But here is the oracular utterance: "Cet offertorium surpasse tout."

It redounds as much to the honour of Berlioz to have reported the following remarks, as to that of Karl Krebs (pianoforte virtuoso and composer, conductor first at Hamburg and afterwards at Dresden, father of Mary Krebs) to have expressed them to the composer. "My dear sir," said the honest Capellmeister, "in a few years your music will make the round of Germany; it will become popular, and this will be a great misfortune! What imitations it will give rise to! What a style! What follies! It would be better for art if you had never been born."

The well-known author of the "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," the conservative Riehl, regards the "Symphonie fantastique" as such an abomination that he prophesies a most awful punishment to the perpetrator of the work. Poor Berlioz is to copy in Purgatory out of the orchestral parts the scores of twenty-five symphonies of Gyrowetz, and to treat in the same manner Pleyel et hoc genus omne, ascending till he reaches Haydn and Mozart, by which time even so hardened a sinner, Riehl fondly hopes, will begin to understand that the best instrumental music is that to which—in the sense of Berlioz—one can attach no ideas.
